HIS Translation was at first design'd as an Amusement, without any Intention of making it publick; the Iranflator not presuming to succeed in the Delicacy and Politeness of a Dialect peculiar to Heroism; but as the Countess D' Aunois is the Author of this Piece, and as most of her Works have had the good Fortune to meet with a favourable Reception, he was induc'd to bope it might obtain the like Succefs: Besides, he wou'd not have ventur'd to deliver it to the Press, had he not confulted with fome judicious Perfons, who had read the Original in French, and were pleas'd to honour it with their Sanction.

It must be own'd at the same time, that this is not a Lateral Translation; for the' in the

the French, the Characters are well drawn, and the Adventures agreeably related, it was thought proper to retrench fome furperfluous Repetitions, which are frequently remark'd in Stories, of this Nature, written in that Language.

As to the last Incident, which is the Murder of Leonida, fucceeded by the Marriage of the Prince of Carency to another Lady; that Circumstance with the Conclusion is entirely alter'd; and it's presum'd, that those, who shall take the Trouble of comparing this with the Original, will approve the Design, since it seems unreasonable, that Leonida, who was a Perfection of Virtue and Beauty, shou'd die a tragick Death ; and that the Prince of Carency, who was so pasfionatly in Love with her, shou'd, after her cruel Fate, conceive tender Sentiments for any other Lady, a Character not becoming a Hero. However, if the Publick (hou'd cenfure this Opinion, the Translator must then Submit to their unquestion'd Judgment; and he humbly hopes, that in Confideration this is his first Estay, they will out of their Candor and good Nature, pardon whatever Fault they find in the Attempt.

THE Prince of CARENCT.

H E Dutchess of Lancaster, Daughter of Don Pedro, King of Castile, cou'd not, without the greatest Concern, see Don John's Accession to a Throne where fhe flou'd have been plac'd, were not her Father's Misfortunes the unhappy Caufe. She very much follicited the Duke her Husband to declare War against him, which he was inclin'd to, only waited for a favourable Occasion of making an Alliance.

At this Juncture, Ferdinand King of Portugal (who often had Differences about Matters of Interest with the King of Castile) gave the Duke of Lancaster an Opportunity of declaring his Intentions, and fent to him, defiring he wou'd join with him in the Conquest of their common Enemy: The Duke, without delay, fet out with a confiderable Number of 2

Forces, and took with him his Wife and Three Daughters : Thefe Ladies were very beautiful, and the Youngest, whose Name was Catherine, being the only Daughter of his fecond Marriage, had Pretenfions to the Crown of Spain by Right of the Dutchefs her Mother, who was Heirefs to that Dominion.

The King of Castile, finding that two fuch potent Enemies had declared against him, apply'd to his Allies, but more particularly to Charles the VIth King of France, to whom he already owed many Obligations. That Prince fent him Men and Money, and Fortune declaring in his Favour, he defeated the English and Portuguese in feveral Engagements. The Sickness produc'd by the Climate, was even more destructive to them than his Arms; but having weighty Reafons to with for Peace, and knowing that the Duke of Lancaster had left the King of Portugal with fome Difgust, he fent the Prior of Guadalupe to him at Bayonne with confiderable Offers, and a Propofal of Marriage between his Son Henry Prince of Asturias, and the Princess Catherine, Daughter of the Duke, which he represented to be the only Means of placing her on the Throne of Spain; and at the fame Time promis'd he shou'd have fufficient Reafon to be fatisfied with their Alliance.

The Duke receiv'd with Pleafure this Overture of Peace, being in all refpects agreeable to his Intereft; and the King's Ambaffadors perform'd the Ceremony of Marriage at Bayonne. The

The Dutchefs of Lancaster left Biscay to conduct her Daughter to Medina del Campo, where the King receiv'd them with all the Magnificence imaginable. She there prefented him in the Name of the Duke her Husband, with a Crown of Gold embellish'd with Jewels, and told him with a majestick Air, that fince she had yielded to him the Right fhe had to the Kingdom of Castile, it was but just he shou'd receive the Crown from the Duke her Lord. The King answer'd, that he only accepted of it with a Defign of putting it on the Princefs's Head, as foon as his Son shou'd be of Age; the young Prince being then but Ten Years old.

The Duke of Lancaster remain'd all this Time at Bayonne, tho' he paffionately wilh'd to fee the King, that he might endeavour to difingage him from the French Intereft: But the Spanish Monarch was too fensible of the Services he had receiv'd, to have any wrong Proceedings with the King of France in fuch a Conjuncture, therefore declined the Interview which the Duke defired ; and being indifpos'd at Burgos, took Leave of the Dutchels in that Place.

Charles the VIth, being inform'd of the King of Castile's Conduct in what related to him, thought himself fo highly oblig'd, that he chose John of Bourbon Count of La March, his Kinfman, as Ambaffador to that Prince ; who had Orders to tell him, that he shou'd ever embrace all Occafions of expressing his Gratitude for for the Value he was pleas'd to fet on their Alliance. The Count of La March was more capable than any of making known the Sentiments of his King, being of the first Rank by his Birth and Fortune, and by his great Qualities esteemed one of the finest Gentlemen of France.

After having acquitted himfelf of his Commission to the King of Castile, he contracted a Friendship with Don John of Velasco, who had married a French Lady, Daughter of Arnauld of Solier. She had for her Fortune the City of Vilalpendo, which is one of the greateft in Castile. Velasco by his Birth, yielded to none but Princes of the Blood, and his Merit was equally great. Dona Maria his Wife, preferr'd the French to all other Nations, and infpired her Husband with the fame Sentiments. The Count of La March had already fo great an Efteem for them, that confidering their vaft Fortune was to be inherited by an only Daughter, he refolv'd to propofe a Marriage between her and John of Bourbon, Prince of Carency, the youngeft of his Sons. and and the Having meditated fometime on this Affair, he vifited Don John of Velasco, and among other things told him, He had three Sons, that the King his Malter had provided for the Two eldeft, and that the Youngest was still at his Disposal. I am satisfy'd, said he, I shou'd have no reason to complain of his Fate, were he defin'd to your Daughter: Therefore, if nothing-opposes our Alliances, I ask her for him.

him. Your Proposal, my Lord, (reply'd Don John of Velasco) is fo obliging, that I have room to believe you fincerely with it. She is yet but. Four Years old, and the Prince your Son but Eight; to what End can we difpofe of the Deftiny of Persons, so little advanc'd in Years? That ought not to be the leaft Obstacle (faid the Count) we can fign the Contract of Marriage, and I will fend the Prince to you, that you may form him for Leonida. I don't question but you will like him, he is a fine Youth, and his Senfe exceeds his Years. You will be under no Difficulty (interrupted Madam Velasco) to persuade us into an Opinion of your Son's Merit; it is fufficient that he is of your Illustrious Blood. By what you are, my Lord, we judge what he may be; and I thank Heaven, that you have fuch favourable Difpositions for Leonida. From her Birth, I defignd her for one of my Country, which is still dear to me : and Don John sets no less a Value on it than 1. It is true (reply'd Don John) I have a great Veneration for the French, and am very fenfible of their Defert. Judge then, added he, with what Pleasure we accept the Offer you make Leonida, which is as much above our Hopes, as her Merit. This Conversation ended with all the Assurances of a perfect Friendship, and the Articles of Marriage were drawn. The Count of La March fent his to the King of France, Don John carry'd his to the King of Castile, and each confented to the Agreement. B 3 Don 1

Don John made his Daughter's Fortune very confiderable, and the whole Court was pleas'd with the Match.

Some time after, the Count of La March preparing for his Return into France, ask'd Don John of Velasco and his Lady, whether they were willing he shou'd fend his Son to them? No, my Lord, (faid they) Let him remain in your Hands; as a Token of our Love and Esteem; the Education you will give him, will make him an accomplish'd Prince; and we hope you will not part with him till he has taken a perfect Impression of your great Example. The Count promis'd he wou'd take all the Care imaginable to render his Son worthy of being ally'd to them; then took his Leave.

The King of Callile acquitted himfelf by the Count, of the many Acknowledgments he owed Charles the VIth. And writing to that Prince, told him, He cou'd not fufficiently praife the Merit and Conduct of his Ambaffador. The Count had not been long arriv'd at the Court of France, when News came of the King of Callile's Death by a Fall from his Horfe, and his Son Don Henry fent an Account of it by Don John of Velasco. The Count of La March took that Opportunity to do him all the Honours of a Court, where he held a confiderable Rank, being nearly related to the King. He prefented the Prince of Carency to him, whom he found to be a finer Youth than he imagin'd; and from that Time; conceiv'd ceiv'd as great an Affection for him, as if he had actually been happy in the Poffession of Leonida. The Peace and Tranquility which France then enjoy'd, was foon after difturb'd by an Accident that happen'd to the King; who being ftruck with Terror and Surprize at an Apparation, fell into a Delirium, which continued for fome time.

At this Juncture there was a very nice Negotiation to be carried on in Spain; and the Dukes of Berry and Burgundy, Uncles to the King, having taken upon them the Adminiftration of Affairs, look'd on the Count of La March as the most capable Perfon to manage it. The seeming Pretence of his Embassy was, the usual Compliments to the King and the Infanta his Brother on their Marriage; the one being lately marry'd to the Princess of Lancaster, and the other to the young Counters of Alburquerck, who was one of the richest Heires's in Europe. The Count of La March, at his Arrival in Spain, found Don John of Velasco in great Favour at Court; the King having made him High-Steward of his Houshold; and Leonida, tho' not above Nine Years of Age, was made one of the Maids of Honour to the Queen, and bred up in the Palace.

Madam Velasco was extremely pleas'd to see the Count again; and her Satisfaction was so much the greater, when he declar'd, he had never seen any thing comparable to the Beauty of her Daughter. He was so surpriz'd when he saw her, that he cou'd not at first express Bat his Admiration; her Hair was black and her Complexion as fair as possible. It may be generally faid of the Spanish Ladies, that they have much finer Eyes than those of other Countries. Leonida's were fo full of Life and Spirit, that one cou'd hardly withstand their Brightnefs; yet they retain'd all that Air of Sweetnefs and Modefty which becomes her Sex fo well. In fhort, the Beauties of her Mind were as perfect as the Charms of her Perfon ; and the Count of La March was fo taken with her, that had not his Glory, and the King's Service call'd him back for France, he willingly, for her fake, wou'd have ftay'd longer at that Court. Some time after his Return, he was fent against the English, over whom he had the good Fortune of getting fo many Advantages as oblig'd them to with for Peace, which foon after was happily concluded, with Propofals made by King Richard, of a Marriage with Ifabella of France; but the Count of La March had not the Satisfaction to be at the Conclusion of it, being forc'd by his Indifpolition to retire to Vandome for fome Relief; and finding there, that his Illness increas'd, he did not doubt but he was very near taking Leave of the World, therefore fent' for, the Prince of Carency, and in a feeble Voice, thus faid to him: The Condition I am in, my dear Son, wou'd give me great Concern, had I not procured a Father for you in Don John of Velasco. I am perfuaded you will find no difference betwixt his Houfe

House and mine, therefore perform the Promife I have made for you; marry Leonida, it is your dying Father's Command. Tell your Brothers how dear they have been to me, and that I recommend them to the Care of Heaven. Do not render your felves unworthy of your Name. Prefer Honour to Life, and never omit what you owe to God, or your King, I had rather fee you dead, than furvive a Difgrace owing to ill Conduct. And as for you, my dear Child, it is a great Confolation to me in dying, to believe your Inclinations will answer the Advice I now give you. The young Prince filled with Grief, fell at his Father's Feet, and in fpite of the Sobs, which prevented his Utterance, he endeavour'd to exprefs himfelf in Terms fo moving and gene-rous, that the Count of La March, after fo great a Satisfaction, had little Regret in dying.

The Year following Sigifmund King of Hungary, fent Ambassadors into France, to defire Charles the Sixth to assist him with Troops, being refolv'd to engage Bajazer. Those Ministers gave the King an Account, how that the Emperor John Palealogus had call'd that Enemy of the Christians to his Assistance, against the Despote of Bulgaria; and that Bajazer making use of the Advantages he had obtain'd, wou'd not leave a Country where they had so imprudently let him enter. The King concern'd at the Condition of Sigismund, permitted most of the Youth of France to make make an Expedition in his Favour. The young Count of Nevers, who was then but Twenty Four Years old, put himfelf at the Head of the young Noblemen, who were very numerous; among others, James of Bourbon Count of La Marth, highly diftinguish'd himfelf. The Prince of Carency his Brother, made this Campaign with him; and it is impossible to exprets the Joy he receiv'd at having fo early an Opportunity of proving his Courage.

The Particulars of this Expedition I refer to the Hiftorian, and shall only fay, there never was a more unhappy Campaign. Bajazet having defeated the Christian Troops, made a horrible Slaughter amongst the French, and with much difficulty, confented to Ranfom Five or Six. The Count of La March and his Brother were dangeroufly wounded, and made Prifoners before Nicopolis. The Prince of Carency was fo afflicted at the Difafter of his Brother, that in his Confinement he nei-ther thought of the Danger of his own Wounds, nor his loft Liberty. When the Count of La March was recover'd, and able to take Care of his, and his Brother's Fortune, he heard with mortal Difpleafure the Resolution Bajazet had taken, of putting all the Prifoners to the Sword; and many were executed in that cruel manner: When the Count of Nevers prefenting his Head to re-ceive the fatal Blow, an old Turk famous for his Predictions, cry'd out, (addreffing himfelf to Bajazet) Spare that young Prince, for he

he will deftroy more Christians than all your Arms. These Words preferv'd the Life they were going to deprive him of, and the Event answer'd the Prophesy. The Prince of Carency appear'd in his Turn, and the deplorable State he was in at fo tender an Age, did no ways lessen that noble Ait, which distinguishes a Man of Birth and Courage from a common Person. He was so perfectly handfom, that Bajazet himfelf was under some Surprize, and irrefolute, whether he shou'd put him to Death, or be contented with his Ranfom: But after fome Sufpenfe, the happy Deftiny of the Prince triumph'd over the natural Barbarity of the other; and Life was granted to him and his Brother, upon Condition, that a confiderable Sum fhould be paid for their Ranfom: They writ to their Brother the Count of Vandome about it; but while they were expecting an Answer from France, they heard that the Count of Nevers had paid his, and was preparing to 'return.

One Night the Prince (not having a mind to retire) as he was walking very difconfolate on the Leads of the Tower where he was a Prifoner, heard the Whiftling of an Arrow, which fell at his Feet: He thought at first, that some Perfon had a Defign upon his Life; but stooping to take it up, perceiv'd a Letter tied to it, which contain'd these Words, written in Lingua Franca.

WHEN you appear'd before the Sultan loaded with Chains and in expectation of immediate Death, did you think you cou'd move any thing but Pity? You inspired at that Time more than you can imagine, Love hid in your Eyes, from a Captive render'd you a Conqueror. Alas, I faw you, my dearest Prince, and from that fatal Moment my Heart rebell'd against my Reason, and forced from me numberless Sighs. Methinks I see you; I imagine I speak to you; and all my Thoughts are of you. I almost persuade my self, that my Sentiments make a deep Impression on you, and that our Souls already united, flatter us with a perfect Felicity. But alas ! that wou'd be too great a Happiness. I dare not hope nor even defire it, and shou'd sooner resolve upon Death, than make-these- Sentiments known to you, were not I perfuaded you will never know who I am: And far from taking any Advantage of my Weakness, you will leave Nicopolis without seeing me. Ob! how unfortunate am I, to find Confolation in being distant from the Object I love! Consider this Extremity, and if you cannot love me because Unknown, at least do not refuse me your Pity. I assure you, it shall not prevail with me, for I will foon put it in your Power to leave this Place. I know your Ranfom is not come with that of the Christian Prince, and that he is preparing to go without you: But do not afflict your self, all Things are possible to Love. Write to me to Morrow at the same Hour you receive this, convey it by the same Meffenger to the Fost of the Tower, and learn betimes times to be secret. Ob, of all Mortals you are the most amiable! Why have I seen you? And why must I never see you more?

The young Prince was not a little furpriz'd at what he read. It feem'd to him fo tender, that he felt an extream Defire to fee the Perfon who express'd fo extraordinary a Paffion for him, and expected with the greateft Impatience, the Time that he was to return an Anfwer. He went as he ufed to do, to the Top of the Tower, and there made a Signal to the Meffenger, who was waiting for it; then flung his Letter over, which was written in thefe Terms.

VOU are the first that ever made me figh; and the Sacrifice I offer you; Madam, of the first Motions of my Affection, ought to give me Some Place in your Favour. I thought till now, it was impossible to love what one never faw; but the Uneafiness I feel, and the ardent Defire I have to see you, convince me you are already too dear for my Peace. Tou render me the most unhappy of all Mankind, if you deny me the Means of making my Retributions, and entertaining you with my Transports. Is it possible you can refuse me that Favour, and at the same Time express so real a Passion for me? What, Madam, can you consent I shou'd go from a Place where you are? Oh! rather leave me in my Pri-Son, fince I am destin'd to wear your Chains.

It was very late before the Prince retired, in hopes the fair Unknown wou'd have fent him a fecond Letter the fame way he receiv'd the First, but was disappointed. He went again the next Day upon the Tower, where every Thing appear'd fo filent, that he had no room to flatter himfelf with what he fo much wilhed. Is it poffible, (faid he to his Brother, who was Prifoner in the fame Place with him, and to whom he had told this Adventure) Is it poffible, that the Perfon who writ this Letter, fought only to divert her felf at my Expence? The oftner I read it, the more reafon I have to believe it fincere ; for I am perfuaded there is a Smypathy in Hearts, and therefore it is impossible to be fo touch'd with what is counterfeited. I am convinc'd of what you fay, (reply'd the Count of La March) and have my felf experienc'd it, which inclines me to think fome other Reafon obliges your Unknown not to write. They pass'd the greatest part of the Day on the Top of the Tower, entertaining each other after this manner, till at last, Night coming on without any hopes of a fecond Letter, they retired. The Prince return'd to his Chamber more melancholy than ever he had been ; but he was no fooner enter'd, when he faw on a little Cedar Table, a Toilet richly embroider'd with the Cypher of his Name woven in Gold : The Work was perfectly fine, it cover'd a Scymiter embellish'd with Jewels and a little Casket with golden Plates, which he open'd with great precipitation, and found 2 a Letter in it, with a Sum that far exceeded his Ranfom. Here is what was wrote in the fame Hand with the first.

GO young Prince, go far from a Place where my Paffion may prove fatal to you. Expect no more Letters from me: This is the laft you will receive. Oh Heavens! I am going to lofe you, and lofe you for ever. Why have not I power to follow you, and render my Fortune inseparable from Yours? I shall never more know your Sentiments: Tou will forget me before it is possible for me to think of any Thing but you, or cease to love you. My Wishes shall ever attend you. Pity me, dear Prince, fince I must pass my forrowful Life in bemoaning your Absence, and my Misfortunes.

The Prince of Carency admired the Proceedings of this generous Lady, and his Gratitude was of fuch a Nature, that the moft transfeendent Passion cou'd not have made a deeper Impression; for when he consider'd he was to lose even the hopes of ever feeing her, his violent Displeasure took place of all the Joy he ought to have felt, at being in a Condition to pay his Ransom, and return to France. He bid one of his Guards go and tell the Count of La March, that he wanted to speak with him; but first took care to hide the magnificent Present he had just receiv'd.

The Count came immediately to him, and faw in his Eyes an extraordinary Air of Grief. As At foon as they were alone, the Prince flung his Arms about his Brother's Neck. I want your Confolation, dear Brother, (faid he) for I can receive it only from you. See! (conti-nued he, flowing him the Casket and Letter) fee! what I owe to my Unknown, and the Necessity she imposes on me to go away without feeing her. Can any Thing be more great or noble ? Or can there be any Thing more foft or moving, than the Words fhe imploys to bid me Adieu? Oh! how fatal will her Generosity be to me, since I must even lose the Hopes of knowing who fhe is. Here he was filent, but after having meditated fome Time : She loves me, faid he, and I burn with a more than equal Paffion for her. Why must I then leave Nicopolis : In remaining here, I may difcover the Perfon to whom I am fo highly indebted, and, if possible, obtain the Happiness of feeing her: For Love certainly is too good a Guide to forfake me in fo fair a way. The Count of La March, who loved his Brother entirely, was of Opinion that fo magnificent a Prefent could not come from any one but a Perfon of the first Rank, and that if he expos'd himfelf by making an Énquiry after her, and penetrated into a Mystery that perhaps ought not to be disclos'd, he might create himself Enemies, which would be of a very dangerous Confequence in a Country where neither his Birth nor Merit could protect him, and where the Name of a Christian was a Crime great enough to deferve Punishment. Full of these Thoughts

Thoughts, he conjured his Brother in the most engaging Terms, not to perfift in a thing which lay under fo many difficulties; and reprefented, to him, that he might not only ruin himfelf. but also be the Occasion of undoing the Person whom he fo dearly loved. Cou'd you ever forgive your felf, faid he, fo Imprudent an Action? The Lady loves you, and were it possible for her to see you without Danger, she wou'd have found means to favour your Request. Therefore, dear Brother, let us go away with the Count of Nevers, and embrace the favourable Disposition Bajazet is in at prefent: His Capriciousness is ever to be fear'd, and fhou'd he change his Mind, what wou'd become of us? Altho' the Count of La March's Arguments

Altho' the Count of La March's Arguments were very weighty, the Prince was unwilling to fubmit to them, having a ftrong Defire to find out by what means the Casket and Scymiter were convey'd into his Chamber. He might eafily imagine, that one of his Guards had been bribed; but as it was hard to difcover the Perfon (fearing he fhou'd apply to the wrong Man) he thought fit to be filent; fo took his leave of Nicopolis, without knowing to whom he owed the higheft. Obligations.

The Prince of Carency's Thoughts were conftantly imploy'd on his generous Unknown; and after his Arrival at the Court of France, he found a fecret Confolation in making her the Subject of his Difcourfe, with the Counts of La March and Vandome, who equally ad-C mired mired a Passion fo difcreet, and a Generosity without hopes of any Return. Most Women that are in Love and make Prefents, faid they, have generally fome View, that tends to their private Satisfaction : They endeavour to gain a Heart by Gratitude, when they cannot con-quer it by their Beauty. But this Illustrious Foreigner, faid the Prince, aim'd at nothing but procuring my Liberty, fince fhe even commanded me to quit the only Place where I cou'd have feen her. He ufed to talk fo often of her, that the Count of La March feared he' had fome defign of returning to Mifia, in order to difcover who this Charmer was. This made him entreat the Prince to write an obliging. Letter to Don John of Velasco, to put him in Mind of their Contract, and affure him, that he only expected his Commands to go for Spain. The Prince having yielded to this Re-queft: Confider well, faid he to his Brother, the Violence I do my felf. Shall I not be for ever unhappy in Marrying a Perfon for whom I have no Inclination? You know very well, that my Heart is fill'd with another Object. It is true, reply'd the Count, you love an unknown Person, who probably you will never fee: You do not even know her Name, and perhaps the is no longer at Nicopolis. Remember, Brother, that Leonida must crown your Felicity, she is a great Fortune, and very Beau-tiful. How easy it is, interrupted the Prince to advise others, and imagine that a Heart ought always to fubmit to Reafon: But alas!

alas! it too often rebels, and never fuffers greater Torments than when it is forc'd into an Engagement by the Choice of others. The Count of La March was doing all his Endeavours to infpire other Sentiments in his Brother, which he hoped time might effect.

The Prince of Carency continued extreamly melancholy till he receiv'd Letters from Don John; wherein he affured him, that his Daughter should never be dispos'd of to any one but himfelf; but that being very young, he defired the Marriage might be defer'd for fome Years, and advis'd him to imploy that time in Travelling. This last Request gave no fmall Satisfaction to the Prince; and as the Mareschal of Boucicault was going then to take Possession of Genoa; which had furrender'dvoluntarily to the King of France, he embrac'd that Opportunity, and went along with him to fee that great City, which paffes for one of the finest in Europe. As fo many have given a Defcription of it, I shall only purfue my Story.

The Marefchal did not make a long flay at Genoa, being commanded to go from thence to Conftantinople with a fresh Army, which became dreadful to Bajazet. The Prince of Carency acquainted the Marefchal with the Defign he had to accompany him in that Expedition; but the latter being inform'd by the Counts of La March and Vandome of the Passion he had for an unknown Lady at Nicopolis, and knowing that he was contracted to Leonida, spoke to him in obliging Terms, and represent-C 2 ed ed how much his Honour was concern'd in the Performance of his Promife to a Perfon of fo, confiderable a Rank; 'declaring at the fame time, that if he infifted on going with him he wou'd be fore'd to inform the Court of it. These Reasons oblig'd the Prince to remain at Genoa in the Senator Grimaldi's House, which had been offer'd to him in a most civil manner.

One Night the Prince being more melancholy than ufual, went alone to the Mole, which affords a fine Profpect, and continued his Walk along the Shore, till he infenfibly found himfelf a great way from the City. How unhappy is my Fate, faid he fighing ! I love and am belov'd, but know not the Object of my Paffion: I can hear nothing concerning her Fortune, nor give her any account of mine; neither can I tell where to find the Lady; whofe Generofity has only ferv'd to deftroy my Peace. He was loft in these melancholy Thoughts, which were fucceeded by others of a more tormenting Nature. Why, continued he, did my Father facrifice me to one whom I can never think agreeable; fince I adore another! yet fomething tells me it is a Crime to difobey him. Oh, too Charming Unknown hery'd he, were you but inform'd of the State I am in; you wou'd recal me to you; but what do I fay? That is a Happinefs I dare not hope, the paid my Ranfom and commanded me to go; it is possible the now loves me no more or ftrives to forget me, and in either of the two, I find but Subject to torment me. bn. artell and ide circulated and

Thefe

Thefe different Reflections were perplexing the Prince, when of a fudden Night came on, with Rain and terrible Thunder, which oblig'd him to direct his Courfe along the Wall of a Park, where he found a Door that led him through a long Alley of Orange-Trees to a fine Pavilion; here he obferv'd a low Parlour, the Pannels of which were gilded, and the Roof finely painted. As the Weather was exceffive hot, the Windows were open, and there being Lights in the Room, they gave him an Opportunity of feeing one of the moft beautiful Perfons in the World leaning on a Couch: She feen'd afleep, holding her Handkerchief in in her Hand; a mourning Veil cover'd half her Neck; and in this Pofture fhe infpired both Love and Refpect.

Love and Refpect. The Prince flood fome time at the Window, and perceiving that every thing was filent, went into the Parlour, and kneeled by her the better to confider her Charms; fhe appear'd pale and dejected, and tho' afleep, fetch'd deep Sighs, which were follow'd by Tears, that found a Paffage thro' her clos'd Eye-Lids. Who merits this Grief, faid he, from fo lovely a Creature? Is it a Husband or a Lover you deplore? He ftop'd here, and reflected on Chance, that had conducted him to a Place fo dangerous to his Liberty. Then he continued; Who can deferve thofe Sighs, and Tears? He looked with Admiration on the exact Proportion of her Features, the Whitenefs of her Hands and Arms, the Beauty of her Neck, and Colour of her Hair: C 3 His

His Eyes, fix'd on fo Divine an Object, had already betray'd his Heart; and he had not well recover'd the first Effects of his Surprize, when the Lady wak'd, who appear'd to be feiz'd with Fear, which had like to have thrown her into a Swoon. He attributed this, to the Cuftom observ'd by the Ladies of Italy, never to fee Men in their own Apartments, and thought fhe might be marry'd to some jealous Husband, who finding a Man in his Houfe fo late, might have fome Sufpicion, which wou'd prove of a fatal Confequence to a Perfon for whom he had already conceiv'd fo great a Paffion. I am extreamly concern'd, Madam, (faid he) at the Diforder I have occasion'd, but will retire with Regret from a Place which gives me fo much Pleafure. No, no, (reply'd fhe) my Dear Lover, (flinging her Arms about his Neck) do not leave me; I love you too well to be frighten'd, tho' my Aftonishment is great. Be Witnefs of the Tears I fhed for your Lofs. Ah! dear Shade, why did that terrible Engage-ment part us? The Prince comprehended no-thing of this obscure Speech, yet thought himfelf happy in the Careffes he receiv'd; and as the Name of a Lover pleas'd him, that of a Shade furpriz'd and afflicted him. The Senfibility he had fhown on this Occasion might have convinc'd this fair Creature, that he was not one of the other World; but her Mind was fo poffefs'd with his being dead, that the fpoke to him as to a Ghoft; which oblig'd him to fay in a melancholy Accent; I find, Madam, you are

are deceiv'd in favour of fome Refemblance, and I protest, were I dead and deplor'd by you, I should think my felf much happier than living and indifferent to you. Alas! I am not the Ob-ject of your Love. Who then, my Dear, reply'd fhe with Precipitation? What Sorrow could be equal to mine, when I heard you were loft in returning from Nicopolis, and that after having escaped the Fury of Bajazet, it was your Miffortune to perish by your Ship's being blown up in an Engagement? I own to you, as I cou'd not believe you fafe, after fo probable a Re-lation, I gave my felf up entirely to Grief. Am I not very unhappy (faid I) to have pro-cured him his Liberty by paying his Ranfom, fince it has forwarded his End: But Oh Heavens! Can any Joy or Surprize be equal to mine? You are living, my dearest Lover, and your Eyes tell me you live for me; read the Motions of mine, they will convince you I live for you alone.

These Words were fo moving, that the Prince cou'd not doubt any longer but this Lady, who entertain'd him fo tenderly, was his Unknown of Nicopolis, and this Opinion occafion'd a Joy, which he cou'd neither conceal, nor express, but thought he shou'd die in Ecstasie at his Mistrifs's Feet; he look'd upon it as a Miracle of Love and Fortune, that he shou'd unexpectedly find fo surprizing a Beauty, and he the Object of her Passion: He six'd his Lips on her Hand, and kiss'd it with such Transports, as he had never felt before. Their C 4 Discourse Discourse had no more Coherence, but their Sighs express'd enough the State of their Souls. The Night was far advanc'd, when they were interrupted by one of the Lady's Women, who came to give her Notice that her Father was just arriv'd. We must part, my dear Lover, (faid the to the Prince,) return to Genoa, and in Two Days come here again, the fame Way, and at the fame Hour; I shall expect you in this Place! Must I leave you, Madam, (cry'd he with a dejected Air) no, I cannot refolve it ; Oh! rather confent I shou'd remain here, no Danger can alarm me where you are prefent. What you ask, faid fhe, is impoffible. Go my Lord, all I can do for you, is to give you my Picture, which I fat for with a Defign to fend to you when you were in Confinement. Here it is, (continued she, taking it from off her Arm, and tying it on his.) Let nothing in the World make you neglect fo precious a Pledge of my Affection. He threw himfelf on his Knees, and wou'd have express'd his Acknowledgments to her; but fhe left him, fearing they fhou'd be furpriz'd by her Father.

She was hardly gone, when the Prince abandon'd himfelf to all the Reflections that cou'd attend fo extraordinary an Adventure: Love; cry'd he, what have I done for thee to merit thefe Favours? Is thy Goodnefs lafting, and may not I apprehend, that by fome fatal Thrn thou wilt deftroy a Profperity fo little expected? Day began to appear, when he he perceiv'd he was still in the Parlour; and fearing his staying longer there might be of fome Prejudice to his adored Mistrets, he left the Place with Precipitation, and return'd to the Senator Grimaldi's.

. As foon as he arriv'd he threw himfelf on his Bed, but cou'd not fleep, his Mind was to much imploy'd on the Thoughts of his Charming Unknown; he had his Eyes continually fix'd on her Picture, and fancy'd in her Absence, he cou'd not have a Companion moredear. He rofe very early, and the Senator hearing he was drefs'd, came to wait on him, and wonder'd to fee in his Countenance more Gaiety and Satisfaction than he had ever remark'd before. My Lord, faid he, (with an obliging Air) tho' I have been in the greatest Uneafinefs about you, not knowing what Accident might have detain'd you a whole Night alone, in a Country where you have fo few Acquaintance, I no longer doubt, but you have met with fome agreeable Adventure; for I find you fo different: from what you, commonly are, that I cannot help congratulating you on it. The Prince, tho a little furpriz'd at what the Senator faid to him, (having naturally fo much Difcretion, as not to be capable of difclofing a Secret relating to Love) excus'd himfelf as a Man of Gallantry wou'd do on fuch an Occasion, and turn'd the Converfation on another Subject, when there came one who interrupting them, told the Senator, that the Count of Fiesque was come to see him ;

him. He rofe up, and faid to the Prince, This Gentleman, my Lord, is of a Birth and Merit fo diftinguifh'd, that nothing can be added to the Sentiments of Efteem and Confideration we all have for him: He has loft a Brother who was not inferior to him, and who refembled you extreamly. In finishing these Words, he went to his own Apartment to receive the Count of Fiefque.

In a little Time after the Senator return'd with the Count, and prefented him to the Prince, who received him after fo polite a manner, that he could have no reason to be difpleas'd at his Vifit ; and during their Converfation, he look'd at the Prince with fuch Marks of Aftonishment, that he perceiv'd the Count had found in him the Refemblance which the Senator had just spoke of. You look at me fo attentively, my Lord, (faid the Prince) that I shou'd think my felf happy, cou'd the Motive that engages you to it acquire me your Friendship. That can be of no Service to a Perfon of your Distinction; (reply'd the Count with great Civility) it is impossible to fee you, my Lord, and not have a particular Efteem for you; but I own that fo perfect a Likeness affects me very much, and that if I were not well assured of my Brother's Misfortune, I shou'd have sufficient reason to doubt it in seeing you. They afterwards turn'd their Dif-courfe on other Things, and parted with true Sentiments of Efteem for each other,

The

The Prince of Carency pass'd the rest of that Day and the next, in making Visits; and as he defign'd to ftay at Genoa fo long as wou'd be agreeable to his Unknown, he was defirous of being acquainted with Perfons of the greatest Confideration there. The Senator Grimaldi approving his Defign, proposed to wait on him to Brancaleon Doria's, who for his eminent Qualities, was highly refpected in the Repub-lick. It is not long, faid he, fince he return'd from Sardinia, where he went to fuccour the King of Sicily, whom, on this Occasion, he generoufly ferv'd; having acted contrary to his own Interest, in regard to some particular Pretenfions he had on that Kingdom. The Senator gave the Prince a true Character of this Lord, and added, that Signora Doria his Lady (who was a Perfon of great Merit) was ftill at Cagliari: If you pleafe, my Lord, (faid he) we will go and make him a Vifit at his Country Houfe; I am fure you will be charm'd with the Beauty, and Wit of his Daughter, which may induce you to ftay fome Time in this Place, for no Body can fee her with Indifferency. If fhe be fo dangerous as you reprefent her, I fhou'd avoid feeing her, faid the Prince; but I confess to you, continued he fmiling, that the prefent fituation of my Heart puts me out of her Power. I left a Mistress at Nicopolis, who entirely possefies my Thoughts. I believe you, my Lord, (reply'd the Senator, fmiling in his Turn) but am a little afraid you were not fo faithful last Night, as you fay, in the the Remembrance of that amiable Stranger.

As the Prince's Appointment was at Night, he haften'd to Signor Doria's, that he might return home time enough to obey the Commands of his Unknown : The Senator upon the Road told him, the young Lady's Name was Olyma pia, that the was pattionately in love with the late Count of La Vagne, and that the Houfes of Fiesque and Doria had a mortal Aversion for each other, which hinder'd her Father from confenting to their Marriage; that altho' they were reduc'd to Defpair, yet the Obstacles they met with, ferv'd only to increase their Affection; and that the Count thought by abfenting himfelf from Genoa for fome Time, Signor Doria's Hatred might diminish; but this Departure prov'd fatal to him, for foon after News came of his Death. Olympia, far from conceal-ing her Grief, yielded her felf up entirely to it, which was fear'd fhe cou'd not out-live. The Prince knowing by Experience, that of all Paffions Love had the greatest Empire, he extreamly deplor'd the Fate of this fair Lady. It is a great Unhappiness indeed, faid he, to be feparated for ever from the Perfon we love : In finishing these Words, they found themselves near the Houfe they were going to, fo that he cou'd not help interrupting himfelf, by praifing it; he had fufficient Knowledge in Architecture to know a well finish'd Building, and in this he found Order, Magnificence, and a fine Situation.

W re not to the last she to you fin the

The Senator Grimaldi introduc'd the Prince to Signor Doria, who gave him a Reception equal to his Rank; and during their Conversation faid; he had never feen two Perfons fo like each other, as the Prince and the Count of La. Vagne. This gave the Senator an Opportunity of defiring Signor Doriato prefent him to Olympia. I cou'd hardly difpenfe with my not anfwering your Request, reply'd he, but that I am affur'd, the Prefence of the Prince will renew her Sorrow, and only ferve to infpire us with Pity: He ask'd them to walk into a Garden joyning to his Apartment, from whence they faw a vaft number of Fountains playing, whofe Waters feem'd to pierce the Clouds, and made by their Fall a pleafing Noife, that infpired agreeable. Thoughts; from thence they went into a Labyrinth at the End of the Garden, and through a little Alley of Jeffamine, he led them into a Grotto, but was not a little furpriz'd to find his Daughter there, who had retir'd to be more at Liberty to indulge those Ideas that were most pleasing to her.

How aftonish'd was the Prince when he faw Olympia, and knew her to be the fame Lady he found afleep in the Parlour, and for whom he had already conceiv'd fo great a Patsion: And how great was her Surprize, when the faw her fuppofed Lover with her Father, who feem'd to have no longer an Aversion for him. She look'd with fomeDiforder at the Prince, whofe Confusion increas'd at the Thoughts of what he had just heard of the Count; of La Vagne. he had just heard of the Count; of La Vagne.

The Condition of their Souls was equally painted in their Eyes, and the Senator Grimaldi began to penetrate into part of the Mystery, when Olympia (advancing towards her Father) flung her felf at his Feet. Oh, Sir! faid she, Oh my Father! Is it possible that you have at last pity'd our Sufferings, and that you your felf reftore me my Lover ? At thefe Words the Prince cou'd no longer be unacquainted with his Misfortune; he turn'd pale, and trembling fupported himself against a Pyramid of Pebbles ; but his Affliction being fuperior to his Courage, he had like to have expired on the Place. Signor Doria, who was posses'd of nothing but Olympia's Error, thought only of undeceiving her. My dear Daughter, faid he, the Prince of Carency whom you fee here, is a Prince of the Houfe of France, who does not know you, nor did you ever see him before ; you are deceiv'd by the Refemblance there is between him and the Count of La Vagne ; I wish that too unfortunate Gentleman were not loft, I wou'd no longer oppose your mutual Defires. These Words were Daggers to her Heart ; she turn'd her Eyes on the Prince, and fix'd them on him a great while without having Power to fpeak, then changing her Colour fainted away, and remain'd without any Senfe of Life. Signor Doria ran for help, whilft the despairing Prince gathering new Strength from his Passion, took her in his Arms, and preffing her tenderly, faid in a low Voice, (interrupted with Sighs) Have not I given you my Heart, Madam? Cou'd Cou'd the Count of La Vagne love you more than I? Who cannot think myfelf undeferving of the Declaration you made me, fince I adore you with too much Ardour ever to change; and I hope my Constancy will make fome Impreffion on you. While the Prince was fpeaking thus, without being heard by Olympia, Signor Doria and the Senator brought fome Water from a Fountain that was near, and having fprinkled a great deal on her, fhe recover'd; but finding her felf in the Prince's Arms; Ah ! leave me, my Lord, faid she (looking at him with a languishing Air, and endeavouring to difengage her felf) you have deceiv'd me and interrupted my Grief, but Death shall foon repair an Error which was not voluntary. It is imposfible to express the State the Prince was in, who found himfelf distractedly in love without any hopes of a Return; he heard his Mistress regret her Mistake, and retract the Professions she had made him; he fecretly reproach'd himfelf for having been inconstant to his Unknown of Nicopolis, but cou'd not be enough furpriz'd at the fatal Likenefs between him and the Count of Vagne, and the Similitude of their Fortunes; they being in the Campaign of Misia both taken Prisoners by Bajazet, sent to Nicopolis, and ranfom'd by their Mistriffes : Every thing had so strange an Affinity, that the Prince had Reafon to think himself the most unhappy of all Mankind.

Olympia's

Olympia's Women being come, they took her from the Prince, who followed her into her Apartment; fhe was laid on the Bcd, which he approach'd; but as foon as the perceiv'd him, she turn'd her Face from him and abandon'd her felf to Grief. What have I done, Madam, faid he, to deferve your Difdain ? You have render'd your felf Miltrefs of my Heart, and prevented me declaring my Sentiments to you, by generoully confelling yours in Terms fo obliging, that I was transported; yet you now hate me, you even deny me a Look; and what ought to influence you in my Favour, incurs your Displeasure. Olympia made no Anfwer, but with a feeble Hand push'd him from her. Signor Doria cou'd not guess at the Meaning of this Difcourfe, not knowing that the Prince of Carency had ever feen his Daughter. The Senator Grimaldi. fuspected fomething of the Matter : But thought it very extraordinary, that fo Infant a Paffion shou'd already have the force of the greatest Engagement.

The Illnefs of this divine Creature increas'd, and the Prince's Defpair was equal to it; It is impoffible to reprefent two Objects more worthy of Compaffion. Signor Doria, diftracted at his Daughter's Condition, defired the Prince to retire, becaufe his Prefence augmented her Pain, and nothing lefs cou'd oblige the other to withdraw; but before he retired, he approach'd her in Oppofition to what they cou'd fay, and kneeling by her Bed: See, Madam, the Affliction I am in, (faid he, with broken Sighs Sighs) own at least, that I deferve your Pity, if you are cruel enough to deny me your Efteem: Oh ! What have I done within these two Days to render me fo odious ? I love you, Madam, to fuch a Degree, that I am too well assured if you difdain me, I cannot live; but what am I faying? If the Life of a Man you no longer feem to value, is a Sacrifice worthy of you, I shall prefer it as a happy Fate. No, my Lord (faid she, endeavouring to answer him) I wou'd not have you participate of my Ruiu, only wish that after the irreparable Lois I have receiv'd, Death may terminate my Miffortunes; I cannot help confessing the greatest Concern to see your Condition. But as I am the Caufe of it, continu'd fhe, it is just I alone fhou'd fuffer; live, my Lord, live I conjure you, forget my Weaknefs, and let me dye. In ending thefe Words, fhe defired her Father, and the Senator to carry the Prince away; they told him, that as it was Olympia's Requeft, she ought not to be difobey'd. Overcome by thefe Perfuafions, he left the Chamber, but fo diforder'd, that they were forc'd to fupport him: Signor Doria led them into a magnificent Apartment, and excus'd his being oblig'd to leave them, his Daughter's Illness requiring his Prefence : The Senator ftay'd with the Prince, who, after being filent fome time, ask'd him if Olympia had been at Nicopolis, and whether it was there she had paid the Count of La Vagne's Ranfom ? He anfwer'd, she had not been there, but that the Count, being taken Prifoner by Bajazet, Bajazet, writ immediatly to his Mistress, and his Brother, defiring the latter to fend him a Supply; that fome Affairs of Importance having at that time oblig'd the Count of Fiefque to go to Rome, Olmypia fear'd his Abfence might detain her Lover the longer in his Confinement, and for that Reafon fold fome of her Jewels, which she cou'd dispose of unknown to her Father, and fent the Value of them into Mifia for his Ranfom; that as he was coming back in a fmall Veffel, it was attack'd by a Pyrate, and whilft they were fighting, the Powder took Fire, and both Ships being blown up, all those who were on board perish'd. This News was brought to Genoa with so many Circumstances, that there was no Room left to doubt it.

The Prince heard this Relation with a great deal of Concern, and after being a while without speaking, he lifted up his Eyes to Hea-ven : I can hardly believe, faid he, there is a Mortal on Earth fo wretched as I am. Give me leave to tell you, Sir, that I was but Eight Years of Age when my Father fign'd a Contract of Marriage for me with Don John of Velasco's Daughter, and on his Death-Bed, commanded me expressly to marry her; fome Years after I was taken Prisoner at Nicopolis, where I was uncertain of Life, or Death, having Reafon enough to fear the worft from Bajazet's unequal Temper, who at last confented to receive my Ranfom, which I expected from France, when a Lady, who is yet unknown - the fala to me, made my Safety her care; the wrote to me, and fent me a Sum, which much exceeded my Ranfom; and I must own, her Wir and Generofity infpired me with fo perfect a Paffion, that I believe, I cou'd not have lov'd her more, had I been acquainted with her. Being thus fet at Liberty, I came to the Court of France, where I made but a finall Stay; my Mind was continually distracted with the Idea of my Unknown, which determin'd me to come here with the Marefchal. Oh! certainly it was the Fatality of my Stars, that conducted me. You have been Witnefs fince my Arrival of my exceffive Melancholy; and as it was not in my Power to conceal it, rather than trouble my Friends, I endeavour'd to find out the most unfrequented Places to be more at Liberty to indulge it. Here the Prince recited his Adventure with Olympia, but the Thoughts of fo cruel a Disappointment oblig'd him to be filent fome time; then recovering a little, he continued his Difcourfe : Oh! Sir, faid he, think how great is my Misfortune; fhe whom I adore at Genoa is not the fame I lov'd in Mifia ; this charming Lady, who flatter'd me with her Heart, is now dying for another; the Tragedy is before my Eyes; I have by my Prefence been an Addition to her Torment, and it is probable, fhe is this Minute expiring, whilft I am reflecting on the Cruelty of my Fate. He role up, and was going out with Precipitation; but the Senator imagining he had a Mind to go to Olympia's Apartment, stop'd him, repre-D 2 fenting, fenting, that fuch a Behaviour wou'd highly difpleafe her, and that he ought rather, by his Abfence, to procure fome Eafe to her diffurbed Mind. The Prince was obflinate, but while they were difputing, they heard the Cries of many Women, which gave the laft Alarm to the Prince. Oh Heavens! the Work is done, faid he (flinging himfelf upon a Couch) It is done! She is now no more; I have loft her for ever! His Tears wou'd not permit him to continue his Complaint. The Senator feeing the melancholy Condition he was in, extreamly pitied him, neglecting nothing, that he thought cou'd allay his Grief, which was too violent for any thing to mitigate.

Some of the Servants came and told them, Olympia had just breath'd her last in her Father's Arms. It is hard to imagine the Agonies the Prince was in when he heard this difinal News; and as he cou'd not doubt the Certainty of it, it flung him into the deepest Despair. Oh! in what tender Language did he deplore her Lofs? and with what Compassion did he move those, who faw him in his defolate State, which time it felf cou'd hardly alter ? He was going away without feeing Signor Doria, which Proceeding might appear irregular, did not one enter into his Afflictions; for he look'd upon this unhappy Parent as the Caufe of his Daughter's Death. The Senator Grimaldi reprefented, that Civility oblig'd him to condole with Signor Doria on the Lofs he had just receiv'd: Say rather (reply'd the Prince with fome Paffion)

on) that I ought to load him with Reproaches. Barbarian as he was, to oppose Olympia's Marriage with the Count of La Vagne, which occafion'd the Cruelty of his Fate, and has been the Source of my prefent Misfortune. Bur, my Lord, (faid the Senator) do you reflect, that if she had been happy in the Count, she wou'd not not have met with this unfortunate Adventure. It is probable I might never have feen her, faid the Prince, (interrupting him) or if I had, I shou'd have known who she was, and confequently not have taken her for my Unknown; and my Gratitude for the one, wou'd have protected me from the Charms of the other; but alas! it is no more in my power: Let us go, faid he, let us go, Sir, I have done my last: His Tears and Affliction oblig'd him to be filent, fo they return'd to Genoa.

The Prince fpoke but little on the Way, and what he faid, only related to the Unhappinefs of his Deftiny. Oh! Night! Oh! fatal Night, cry'd he, what Pleafures did you not promife me? This Minute I fhou'd have been with that divine Creature according to her own Appointment: Alas I fhall fee her no more! her beautuous Eyes are fhut for ever. Thefe Cruel Reflections made him very thoughtful, and the Senator took that Opportunity to fpeak to him: Cou'd you follow my Advice, my Lord (faid he) you wou'd endeavour to conquer two Paffions which torment you at once; for you love a Lady at Nicopolis, whom it is likely you may never fee; Olympia you have feen, and D 3 lov'd lov'd her at first Sight, she is now no more: I must own that all the Circumstances of your Adventures are fatal; but if you call Reafon to your Affiftance, it will tell you, that your Love is only due to Leonida; fhe is deftin'd for you, and I am inform'd, fhe is a Perfection of Virtue, and Beauty : Why then, my Lord, shou'd an Unknown, or a Person that is no more, deprive her of the Right fhe has to your Heart ? Why? reply'd the Prince; alas, is it in my Power to love whom I pleafe, and forget two Objects that fo entirely poffels my Soul ? Love, without confulting Duty, takes Poffeffion of our Inclinations; he promifes a thoufand Pleafures, and will fometimes' grant fmall Favours: But oh! what Bitternefs has been mix'd with those he has hitherto bestow'd on me? The Senator perceiv'd by the Warmth of his Difcourfe, that his Advice, tho' very reafonable, was ill tim'd, therefore chofe rather to pity the Prince, than condemn those Sentiments which were too paffionate and confus'd to be eafily conquer'd.

Olympia's Death was generally lamented at Genoa, being a Lady endow'd with many Excellencies: The Count of Fiefque was extreamly touch'd at it. Nothing cou'd give more Luftre to my Brother's Merit (faid he to his Friends) than the Sacrifice of this fine Creature, who defpifing Fortune that perfecuted them, wou'd not furvive his Fate; no lefs than fo great an Example cou'd perfuade me, that a Paffion does pot expire with the lofs of its Object.

The

The Prince of Carency (who spoke of her with great Concern) foon made his Paffion known to the World : his Affliction was fo deep that it appear'd in his Countenance, and tho' he was deny'd to all Company, yet he cou'd not refuse seeing Don Fernand Benavidez, who was a Nobleman of Andalusia lately arriv'd from Spain; and appear'd to be fo fine a Gentleman, that he eafily gain'd the Friendship and Confidence of all who were acquainted with him. He was at that Time distractedly in Love with Leonida, whom he had often feen by the Means of his Sifter Cafilda, who was alfo Maid of Honour to the Queen of Spain, and was Mistrefs of fo many agreeable Turns of Wit, that Leonida prefer'd her to the reft of her Companions. The perfect Friendship that was between these Ladies, gave Benavidez an Opportunity of declaring to his Sifter, the Sentiments he had for Leonida, which engaged her to speak often to the young Lady in his Fayour, but without the least appearance of Succefs. As he knew she was contracted to the Prince of Carency, who was then at Genoa, he was feiz'd with fo immoderate a Fit of Jealoufy, that he refolv'd to make that Voyage on purpose to see his Rival; and sometime before his departure, converfing with Cafilda, he faid to her, It is possible, Sister, I may discover fome effential Defect in his Perfon or Humour, which being made known to Don John of Velasco and Leonida, will give them such an Averfion to him, as may induce them to break a Match D4

Match that is not yet fo far advanc'd, as to deftroy all my Hopes: But if in this happy Rival, I can fpy no Fault, I shall then apply to the only Remedy I have left; he must die by my Hand, or I by his, and in either of the Two I shall think my felf much happier than in my prefent Condition. Cafilda, who lov'd her Brother entirely, was furpriz'd and griev'd at fo violent a Refolution; You need not go to Genoa, faid she, with a Defign to difcover any Imperfection in that Prince ; I have feen those who know him, and have no Intereft in fpeaking his Praife, yet agree they never faw a more compleat Gentleman; befides, his high Birth greatly diftinguishes him, and Don John is a Man of too much Ambition, not to promote a Match fo glorious to his Family; therefore depend upon it, you will never pre-vail with him: I advife you to make your Paffion known to Leonida, before you venture on any other Attempt : The Affection fle has for me, may induce her to be favourable to you, Love is capricious, and there are no Measures to be taken with it. Chance often decides the ftrongest Passions, and if you can meet with that Sympathy which produces the Union of Hearts, you need no other Means to make you happy. Ah! my dear Sifter, (reply'd Benavidez) do not flatter me, I have not Refolution enough to follow your Advice ; if my Confeffion offends her, the will forbid me ever feeing her more, which must foon put a Period to my Life; therefore I will try all other Ways before

I speak to her. Cafilda feeing her Brother fo firmly resolv'd, took no further Trouble to perfuade him to the contrary.

Thus he fet out on his Journey, and being arriv'd at Genoa, went to visit the Prince. He could not have recommended himfelf better, than by fpeaking Olympia's Praife, and deploring his Misfortune in her Lofs ; but one Day in Conversation, he faid to him defignedly, You are not fo much to be pity'd, my Lord, as you imagine, fince Donna Leonida is destin'd to be yours. I believe (continu'd he, endeavouring to difcover the Prince's Sentiments) you may find fuch Perfections in her, as will make you forget your other Difappointments. Thefe Words rather afflicted than confol'd the Prince. You fee my Grief, reply'd he, and as you are my Friend, I must own to you, the Engagement my Father has laid me under, gives me a mortal Difpleasure: Were my Destiny in my own Power, I wou'd entirely lay aside all thoughts of Marriage; for at an Age that others are hardly capable of receiving the first Impressions of Love, I have indur'd all its Torments, without being blefs'd with any of its Pleafures.

Whilft the Prince was fpeaking, Benavidez had time to divert the confus'd Thoughts which tormented him; he extreamly rejoyc'd to hear the Prince declare the Indifferency he had for Leonida; but that Joy was often interrupted with those Fears which generally attend great Paffions. Here he refum'd the Difcourfe, and express'd express'd himfelf with fo unaffected an Air, that the Prince did not fuspect the least Defign. I participate with you, my Lord, (faid he) in your Trouble, which is too well grounded. The most agreeable Marriage, Time may render indifferent. Constant Society, discovers many Failings, and it is very rare to find any Happinefs in an Alliance contracted without Inclination; but thefe are not the only Reafons that induce me to pity you. Here he ftop'd, and feem'd in a fort of Diforder, as a Man who had faid more than he wou'd willingly have done : The Prince taking Notice of it, I penetrate your Thoughts, Don Fernand, faid-hewhy fhou'd you conceal any Thing from one who has no Referve to you; pray tell me what you know of Leonida. I know nothing prejudicial to her Honour, reply'd Benavidez ; but I must own, my Lord, I am fo particularly acquainted with her, that I fear you will be very unhappy if ever the is yours ; her Humour is inconstant and fuspicious, the Haughtiness of her Mind is infupportable to all that know her; and, in fhort, fhe is become fo ridiculous at Court, that fhe wou'd meet with many Affronts, were it not for the Rank her Father holds there. While the Banks was maline

Oh Heavens! what do you tell me ? (cry'd the too credulous Prince) is it poffible that all thofe who fpoke of her, have endeavour'd to deceive me in, faying fhe was the most accomplish'd Creature they had ever feen. They only faid it to soften your Grief, my Lord, (reply'd

(reply'd Benavidez with an indifferent Air) and I think my felf very imprudent for having treated her with fo much freedom. You know me not, my dear Benavidez (faid the Prince, taking him in his Arms) do you think me ca-pable of receiving ill fo generous a Confidence : No, I proteft, I am extreamly oblig'd to you, and what grieves me most is, that I cannot make the right use of it; my Fate is decreed and there is no declining it. What, my Lord! do you then intend to marry her? reply'd immediately Benavidez : Alas! what can I do, faid the Prince ? it was my Father's last Command, and I will not deferve the Reproach of having difobey'd him. For my part, cry'd Benavidez, I shou'd for ever upbraid my felf, if I fuffer'd you to proceed any farther in this Affair; as I profess my felf one of your most zealous Friends, I will fooner give my Life than fee you unhappy. You carry your Friendfhip too far, generous Benavidez, (reply'd the Prince) it is not reasonable that my Indifference for Leonida shou'd make her Relations your Enemies ; therefore 1 am refolv'd to offer my self a Victim to my Father's Will, without thinking any more of what I may have to fear in the Society of a Perfon fo difagreeable. Benavidez began to apprehend, that if he continued to oppose the Prince in his Design, it might give him fome Caufe of Sufpicion, fo took his Leave in the most violent Despair. How unfortunate am I ? (cry'd he) what must I resolve on ? I adore Leonida, and can never flatter ter my felf with a Return, whilst the Prince of Carency, who loves her not, is going to posses all her Charms. No, I cannot bear the Thoughts of it; I must factifice this happy Rival before he fees his Miftrefs, or lofe my Life. He pronounced thefe Words with a menacing Air; and like a Man almost distracted, was tempted more than once, to return and stab the Prince; but after having been some Time in this Diforder, his Spirits became more calm. What! faid he, can I with Juffice hate him, fince he is my Rival against his Will? Ought not I rather to open my Breaft to him, implore his Pity, and conjure him to yield Leonida to me? No, this Expedient will never do, cry'd he again, I cannot repofe this Confidence in him : What wou'd he think of me, fhou'd I confeis a Paffion for her, after having defcrib'd her as a Perfon undeferving of him, and advifed him against her; he must then believe me the greatest of Villains : But let him think what he will of my Sentiments, I had rather fubmit to every Thing, than be depriv'd of the Object I love : I shall tell him the Reafons which induc'd me to fpeak of her as I did: The Force of my Paffion will excufe me to a Perfon who is fo well acquainted with the Effects of Love, and has no other Motive to marry than Obedience. But alas ! my Happinefs is not in his Power : Leonida's Father is the first Grandee of Spain, Constable of Castile, and the King's Favourite ; and suppose all his Engagements with the Prince were intirely tirely broke off, he wou'd defign a Match for his Daughter much more confiderable than I could pretend to be. Thefe melancholy Reflections ferv'd to perfuade him, that to facrifice the Prince, or implore his Aid, wou'd be equally of no Effect, and that he ought to find other Means to procure himfelf the only Thing on which depended his Felicity.

Benavidez flay'd fome Time at Genoa, and the Prince proposing to go on his Travels, in hopes that changing of Places might divert his Grief, ask'd him whether he was willing to go along with him? He accepted of the Offer, and the Senator Grimaldi, who was perfuaded that the Prince's Affliction was exceeding great, refolv'd alfo to accompany him to Rome, being generoufly inclin'd to partake of his Troubles, fince he cou'd no ways remove them: He had a mighty Refpect and Friendship for the Prince, whofe Merit and diftinguishing Qualities made fo ftrong an Impression on those who knew him, that they cou'd not help admiring him. Benavidez had now laid a Defign; whereby he ex-pected to break the Prince's Measures; and in order to fucceed he wrote to his Sifter, that Chance had conducted him to Genoa, where the Prince of Carency was deploring the Death of Olympia Doria, with whom, at first fight, he had fallen paffionately in Love. Upon this he gave an agreeable Turn to his Letter, which render'd it very diverting, but fo ridiculoufly characteriz'd the Prince, that he wou'd have had all the reafon imaginable to refent it, had he known any Thing of the Matter. Be-

Benavidez defired his Sifter, by a private Note, not to neglect flowing his Letter to Leonida, which fhe as exactly perform'd as he cou'd have wish'd. One Day as they were both taking the Air, Cafilda told her, the had receiv'd a Letter from her Brother, wherein her Name was often mention'd. He has been some Time absent, said Leonida, does he not talk of returning foon. He is at prefent im-, ploy'd in your Service (reply'd Cafilda, malicioufly) fince he is confoling a Prince for whom you ought to be concern'd; and if you will promise me to be fecret, I can tell you fome-thing in Confidence, that may be of Use to you. I know you are always diverting your felf with one Raillery or other, faid Leonida, (who really thought it was nothing but a Jeft) nevertheless I promise you to be secret, if that will do. Take this Letter then and read it, reply'd Cafilda, you will fee I am in earnest, and that the Prince of Carency in giving you his Heart, will present you with nothing new. Leonida read with fome kind of Eagernefs, what Benavidez had written to his Sifter ; then looking on her finiling, I must confess, faid she, I am no ways alarm'd to hear of the Prince's Paffion for a fine Woman, and am vain enough to flatter my felf, that when he fees me I shall have it in my Power to deface the Impreffion fhe might have made on his Heart; I am perfuaded a dead Rival can prove no ways dangerous; and provided I have no other to fear, I dare be affur'd I shall live in perfect Tranquility.

lity. Cafilda was extreamly confus'd to fee in what manner Leonida had taken a thing, that fhe imagin'd wou'd have vex'd her, but conceal'd her Diforder. You are in the right, my deareft Companion, (faid fhe, embracing her) to promife your felf every Thing from your incomparable Charms; they have Power enough to eclipfe the strongest Ideas of any Love, but that which you inspire. Leonida, whose Modefty was parallel to her Beauty, wou'd hear no more of these Encomiums, so interrupted her, defiring fhe wou'd chufe fome other Subject for their Conversation. I wou'd willingly oblige you, reply'd Cafilda, did I not think my felf bound in Friendship to represent to you the Advantages you have over the Prince of Carency, and how unfortunate you will be if you marry him: Reflect a little on what my Brother writes: Can any Thing be equal to the Weaknefs of a Man who falls diftractedly in Love with a Perfon at first fight, knowing at the fame Time he was deftin'd to be Yours? It is eafy to judge of his Character by fuch a Proceeding ; indeed, (pursu'd she, sighing) it grieves me, that you shou'd be promised to One who fo little deserves you. I am fenfible of the Marks you give me of your Affection, my deareft Cafilda, (reply'd Leonida) and am not less touch'd at the Misfortune you have made me foresec; were I Mistress of my Deftiny, I cou'd make a Choice different from that which is allotted me : I wifh my Father wou'd confult my Sentiment's on that Subject, and and not fo entirely follow his own ; but let what will happen, I am refolv'd to obey him, and will not even endeavour to make him change his Refolution : If I am unhappy in a Person I do not like, it shall only affect my felf, being determin'd never to give him any Reafon to complain of my Conduct. Cafilda made no Objection to fo reafonable a Difposition, fearing Leonida shou'd perceive some underhand Defign, but thought fhe had made a good Progrefs for the first Attempt, in discovering from her own Mouth, that the not only look'd on the Prince with Indifference, but had already conceiv'd an Aversion for him, which flatter'd her, that Time wou'd procure fome other Opportunity of practifing fuch Artifices as fhe was capable of framing.

The Prince at this Time was at Rome, and being inform'd of the Emperor Vendifla's Journey to Rheims, where the King of France was preparing to give him a Reception, believ'd, on this Occafion, the Court wou'd appear in its greateft Luftre, and that it might be taken ill if he were not prefent; therefore propos'd that Tour to the Senator and Don Fernand, who readily confented to accompany him to the Solemnity.

Upon his Arrival at Paris he order'd a fine Equipage to be made, and from thence went to Rheims: The pretext of the Emperor's coming there, was a Treaty of Marriage between the Duke of Orleans's Daughter and the Marquis of Brandenburg, tho' fome afcrib'd it to other other Motives. The young Princes and Lords who attended the Emperor and the King of France to this Meeting, left them to treat by themfelves, and pafs'd their Time in Pleafures agreeable to their Age; as Tournaments, running at the Rings, and Balls, which daily fucceeded each other with fo much Order and Magnificence, that all the Nobility of France endeavoured to be Spectators of this triumphant Seafon.

The Prince of Carency amidst these Pleasures, was extremely melancholy; his Unknown of Nicopolis, the Death of Olympia, and his Averfion for Leonida, were equally a Torment to him, and Benavidez entertain'd him constantly in all these Dispositions.

Soon after the Emperor and the King of France, having agreed on what they came to treat of, took leave of each other ; the latter being then inform'd that a Rebellion had broke out in England, sent over a Number of Troops under the Command of the Count of La March : The Count of Vandome and the Prince of Carency, who were defirous of acquiring Glory, embrac'd that Occasion, and accompany'd their Brother in this Expedition. The Senator Grimaldi took his Leave here of the Prince, and return'd to Genoa, but Don Fernand Benavidez went over with him for England, where they met with fo little Succefs, that they were foon forc'd back. At their arrival at the Court of France, the Prince of Carency perceiving that the Princes of the Blood. his near Relations, were

were in Contest relating to the Regency, thought he cou'd not well remain there without engaging in their Quarrel, fo refolv'd to return to Rome; and having told his Defign to Benavidez, who was willing to go with him, took leave of the Court, and fet out on his Journey.

The mean while, Leonida and Cafilda were made Ladies of Honour, which allow'd them more Liberty than before ; and as they waited on the Queen whenever fhe went abroad, many People who had never fcen Leonida, were fo charm'd with her, that fhe foon pass'd in Spain for a furprizing Beauty. This Opinion did no ways intitle her to the Friendship of her Sex ; for tho', the Ladies at Court cou'd not difown her extraordinary Merit, yet it invited them all to envy her. Cafilda used to talk very much to her in favour of her Brother, faying Things at the fame Time entirely to the Prince of Ca-rency's Difadvantage: It is true, that what the cou'd fay in behalf of the one, made but a flight Impression on Leonida; but then the ill Character she gave of the other, perplex'd her extremely : fhe began to think her felf very unhappy in the Choice her Father had made for her, of a Prince, who had no other Recommendation but his Birth. I cannot imagine (faid fhe one Day to Cafilda) why the World will attribute fo many fine Qualities to a Man who is far from possessing the least of them, and how those who have seen him, can study to deceive me in his Fayour. That is the Character racter of the Age, reply'd Cafilda; the Prince is confider'd as a Man of an eminent Rank and great Fortune; and fuch Perfons as know he is contracted to you, will certainly fet him off to the greatest Advantage: I am even furpriz'd at the Sincerity of my Brother, who I fear will have Caufe to repent hereafter of what he has done: It is pollible you may one Day tell the Prince what he writ to me about him, and your Difdain will be his only Reward for the Intention he had to ferve you. Ah! know me better, cry'd Leonida, and do not think me guilty of Ingratitude; I am too fensible of my Obligation to your Brother, ever to expose him to the Prince's Refentment; and I declare to you, my dear Cafilda, that after having confulted my Inclinations, I am at last resolv'd to make good use of his Advice: I will throw my felf at my Father's Feet, and represent to him my Aversion for the Prince in so feeling a manner, that my Prayers and Tears shall prevent his concluding our Marriage. Cafilda was extreamly pleas'd at this Declaration, and encourag'd Leonida in that Defign, not omitting to put her in mind of the Misfortunes which attend an Alliance made out of political Motives; and not to give her Time to change a Refolution fo agreeable, flie conducted her to Don John's Apartment, and there left her, in order to go and write to Benavidez : Her Letter was in these Terms;

Return.

The PRINCE

52

REturn, dear Brother, return, every Thing anfivers your Defires; Leonida believes the Picture you fent her of the Prince, is a true Copy of the Original, and that Love has no Share in what you write. Oh Heavens! how happy flou'd I be, had I as much Reason to be contented with my Destiny as you have with yours! But the ungrateful Henriquez has relapsed into his first Pasfion, in spite of all the Care I took to prevent it; be has seen Donna Blanca; consider then the State I am in. I impatiently wait your Return to tell you my Trouble, and beg your Consolation, fince nothing else is capable of giving me any.

Benavidez was arriv'd at Rome when he receiv'd this Letter, which gave him inexpreffible Joy : Cafilda's Affliction had not Power to interrupt the Pleafure he had conceiv'd at the Thoughts of Leonida's being difpos'd to favour his Passion: He went to visit the Prince, who no fooner faw him but perceiv'd fo great an alteration in his Countenance, that he could not help inquiring into the Caufe; Benavidez, faid he, you must have receiv'd some agreeble News, for your Eyes feem to own it. I will not keep any Thing a Secret from you, my Lord, (reply'd he) I come rather to make you my Confident. Speak then with an entire Confidence, faid the Prince, you cannot do me a greater Pleasure. I am in Love, continu'd Benavidez, and have fome Reafon to flatter my felf with an obliging Return. You must know, that my Mistrefs having unjustly suspected my Con-

Conftancy, by the false Infinuations of some of my Enemies, wou'd not fo much as hear me in my Juftification, but forbad me her Prefence; and the Care she took to avoid me, had like, with my Life, to have ended my Misfortunes. I left the Court very difconfolate and retired to my Country Seat, where I found, that Solitude only augmented my Grief; therefore to remedy this Ill, I refolv'd to Travel, fo took leave of my Sifter the most distracted of all Mankind. She extremely pity'd my Condition, and promis'd, in my Absence, to use her utmost Endeavours to make my Peace, which at last fhe has done with the most obliging Circumstances. My Mistrefs recals me, and now impatiently defires my Return; but in spite of my Passion, I am fensibly affected, my Lord, with being oblig'd to leave you; for I have felt fo real a Satisfaction in your Company, that I cou'd wish I had never known you, or that I were never to part from you.

The Prince, at these Words, embrac'd him with great Tenderness, which shew'd, that his Departure touch'd him to the Heart: I was in hopes, faid he, you wou'd have gone with me to the Court of Navarre, where my Brother is to marry the King's Daughter, and has defired me to attend the Ceremony. What Violence must I do to my secret Pain, in a Place, where nothing but Pleasure will be thought of ? I cannot abandon my self to my Melancholy, neither do I believe I can be so good a Counterfeit, as to conceal it from Persons so difcern-

ing ; and if I speak of my torment to my Brother, I fear he will not think it worth his Con-cern. Judge then, my dear Benavidez, what Confolation your Company wou'd be to me, fince you not only deplor'd my Fare, but foften'd my Misfortunes, and in all Respects have appear'd the best of Friends: Oh, how neceffary wou'd your Affiftance be in this Juncture, and how extremely shall I regret your Abfence ! But these Considerations are too weak to oppose what your adorable Mistrefs commands, and your Inclinations invite you to obey. Go then (continu'd he fighing) go and tafte those Pleasures which are prepar'd for you. He finish'd these Words with fo dejected an Air, that it wou'd have created Pity in any one but a Rival; for when once we adore an Object, we conceive an Aversion for those who are Obstacles to our Happiness, and have no longer Power to be just, even to the Merit of any other Votary. The Nuptials of the young Princess of Na-

The Nuptials of the young Princefs of Navarre were celebrated with a Pomp and Magnificence equal to the Occafion ; all manner of Diversions were given at the King's Expence, to make that Solemnity as fine as possible; but in the midst of these Pleasures, the Prince appear'd lost in a Distraction of Mind, which was too great for any thing to alleviate ; however he affected a Gaiety which he was so little us'd to, that the Counterfeit was easily perceiv'd. What makes you fo very melancholy, Brother ? (faid the Count of La March to him one Day)

I fee the Violence you do your Inclinations when you are in the best of Company: It wou'd be better for you to break off with your Friends, and give your felf up entirely to your own Humour. You make me an indifferent Return, interrupted the Prince, for the Care I have taken to conceal my Chagrin; but I proteft to you, that it is of fuch a Nature as cannot be conquer'd; therefore, dear Brother, I will take your Advice, and in banishing my felf from a Place where my Prefence is difagreeable, avoid Reproaches, which very much affect me. These Words made the Count of La March fenfible, that to rally him upon his Grief, was a certain Way to augment it; and as he lov'd the Prince dearly, and found many fhining Qualities in him, he embrac'd him with the greatest Marks of Affection. What, dear Brother, (faid he in an obliging manner) is it poffible you shou'd take a Thing fo feriously, which was only defign'd as a Jeft ? Do you think, that for fo flight a Matter your Company cou'd be difagrecable to me? No, do your felf more Justice, and never fuspect mine. So unfortunate a Man as I am, reply'd the Prince, has ever room to fear, and if you knew what it is never to have feen one Mistrefs, and to lofe another as foon as you had conceiv'd a Passion for her, you wou'd not add to my Pain. The Count cou'd not help finiling at the Fantasticalness of these different Adventures. You do not pity me then, faid the Prince, nor comprchend how one can fuffer fo much with fo E4 little little reafon; you think it ridiculous in me to figh for a Perfon I do not know, and for one that is now no more; but Oh! thefe Two Things are the principal Caufe of my Melancholy. The Count of La March pity'd him extremely, and omitted nothing afterwards that cou'd confole him.

By this Time Benavidez was arriv'd at Madrid, where he found 'a great Alteration, the King being dead, and the Care of his Son Don John's Education (who was then but Twenty Two Months old) left to Don Diego Lopez of Cuniga, and Don John of Velasco; which Mark of the King's Efteem for these two Lords, in reposing so great a Trust in them, gave a mighty Addition to their Fortunes and Power. The Court was very much divided at that Juncture; the Infanta Don Fernand, Brother to the late King, having a confiderable Party, was offer'd the Crown, but he generously declin'd it, and had the young Prince proclaim'd King; which was perform'd to the great Satisfaction of the Queen, who (after her Son was fettled on the Throne) retired to Villa Real for the Benefit of the Air, and agreeable Situation of the Place.

It was here that Leonora, Wife to Don Diego Lopez, introduc'd her felf into the Queen's Favour, and had fo great an Influence over her, that whatever fhe ask'd, was immediately granted; fhe had a great deal of Wit, but of fo dangerous a Nature, that those who fincerely espous'd the Queen's Interest, began to lose their Credit by her malicious Infinuations, which which made them in a little time conceive as great an Aversion for the Sovereigh, as for the Favourite.

Thus was the State of Affairs when Benavidez came to Villa Real, where he ftaid fome Time before he cou'd find an Opportunity to fpeak with his Sifter; becaufe, during the first Days of Mourning, it is the Custom in Spain, not to admit any Perfon into the Palace except the Family; but as foon as the Queen cou'd be feen, he was introdue'd into her Apartment, where he found Leonida and Cafilda. It is impossible to express the different Agitations he was in at the Sight of Leonida, who might have difcover'd his fecret Thoughts, had she perceiv'd his Diforder.

After having fatisfy'd the Queen in fome Particulars relating to his Travels, he haften'd to his Sifter's Apartment; but was agreeably furpriz'd, when paffing through a Gallery of Paintings, where Cafilda had defignedly invited Leonida to walk, he met them, and faluted Leonida with much Respect. Give me leave, Madam, (faid he) to acquit my felf of the Commission I receiv'd from the Prince of Carency, who charg'd me to affure you, that he will be foon here, in order to conclude a Marriage to which you are destin'd, tho' unknown to each other. It is an equal Misfortune to us both, (reply'd Leonida with a dejected Air) and the Particulars you writ to Cafilda relating to the Character of that Prince, have fo tormented me, that I have omited nothing ever fince, which

which I thought cou'd perfuade my Father to change his Refolution; but he to frictly regards his Word, that hitherto my Prayers and Tears have had no Power to move him. Benavidez fetch'd a deep Sigh, and after a Moment's Silence ; The Prince defired me, Madam, (faid he) to fend your Picture to him, and I must confessit wou'd be a Trouble to me to fee him receive that Favour, had he not a Profpect of being happy in the Poffellion of the Original. I cannot dispose of my Picture, interrupted Leonida, without my Mother's leave, therefore it depends on you to ask it of her, but in my Opinion, it is entirely unnecessary : The Prince will fee me too foon for his Peace or mine. I am not amiable enough to efface the Objects which poffefs his Heart, but I will try, by my Obedicince, to deferve his Efteem. Madam! faid Benavidez, fince you confent to it, I will tell Madam Velasco, that it is the Prince your Lover's Requeft. Speak to whom you please of it, reply'd Leonida, with an Air of Contempt, but do not call fo fantastical a Perfon my Lover ; I can never like a Man that falls in love with all he fees, and even with chofe he never faw.

As the had finish'd these Words, Madam Velafco, who was going to the Queen's Apartment, enter'd the Gallery: She knew Benavidez had (been a great while with the Prince of Carency, which made her fuppose there was an intimate Friendship between them; and as her Concern for a Prince who was contracted to her Daughter

ter cou'd not indifferently affect her, she immediately enquired after his Health, and express'd a great Impatience to see him in Spain. Benavidez told her he had left Rome, and was going to the Court of Navarre, to be at the Solemnity of his Brother the Count of La March's Nuptials, with the Princess Beatricia, Daughter to the King; that the Prince passiohately wish'd for Leonida's Picture, which he had promis'd to ask for him, and therefore addrefs'd her for that Favour. Madam Velafco was very much pleas'd at the Zeal Benavidez feem'd to have for his Friend, and told him, She wou'd do any Thing that might be agreeable to the Prince ; that her Daughter fhou'd fit for her Picture, and defired he wou'd take Care to fend it to him. Benavidez found that his Hopes as well as Paffion augmented, and flatter'd himfelf that the Plot he was framing wou'd have its defired Effect; he left Madam Velasco and Leonida to go with his Sifter into her Apartment, and after giving each other Proofs of an entire Affection; I have fomething to fay to you, Brother, faid she, come into my Clofet: She took him by the Hand, and fitting down, cou'd not help shedding a shower of Tears. You weep, my dear Casilda, (faid he, embracing her) have you any Thing to fay to me concerning Don Henriquez? Ah! Brother, (faid she) he is the ungrateful Object that troubles my Peace, and remembers no more the Obligations he owes me : I shall find fome Eafe in relating to you all that has happen'd, happen'd; and as a difappointed Paffion is lefs difcreet than a fuccefsful one, I am going to inform you of what you know but very imperfectly. Don Henriquez was on Board the Fleet with the Admiral his Father, when one Day as the Queen was hunting, and we all at-tending her, Donna Blanca's Horfe flarted, and not knowing how to manage him, ran away with her : Several Cavaliers rode after her, who were invited to ferve her, either by Inclination or Interest, she being perfectly handfome, and Daughter to Leonora, who was then the Queen's Favourite. As I am naturally politick enough, I endeavour'd to reach her before the reft, when I faw her from the rifing Ground I was on, fall in a Valley; I rid as fast as possible to her Assistance, where I no fooner came, but the first Thing that struck my Sight, was a Cafe fet with Diamonds, which drop'd out of her Pocket when the was thrown off her Horfe; I took it up, and had no other Reafon for not returning it inftantly, but the Curiofity of feeing what was in it. Donna Blanca was in a Swoon when the reft of the Company came up; they immediately gave her what they thought wou'd reftore her to her Senfes, being ftun'd with the Fall; and as foon as she came to her self, she perceiv'd she had loft her Picture-Cafe, which was fought for, but in vain. I took notice of all her Motions, and her Uneafiness increas'd, with the fear of not finding what was fo dear to her : This gave me me the greater Inclination to keep it, with the only View to mortify her, being one of the fineft young Ladies of the Court, and Daughter to the Favourite.

As the had receiv'd no Hurt, the went up to the Queen, but appear'd fo melancholy, that her Mother express'd much Concern. I was impatient to be alone, that I might fee what was contain'd in the Cafe; but how can I tell you Brother, or at least in telling you, ought I not to dye with Shame? I had but just cast my Eyes on the Picture, which was inclos'd, when I found fuch Motions in my Heart as furpriz'd me, being what I never felt before. I was charm'd with the noble Air and Youth of a Gentleman, whole Features were fo admirably well drawn, that I cou'd no ways doubt but it very much refembled the Perfon whom it was defign'd for; I gaz'd at it with Delight, and, tho' unknown to me, I thought it was impossible to fee any Thing more lovely. I did not confider at first, how dangerous my Curiofity might prove, fo imploy'd fome Hours in admiring this fatal Picture, whofe Idea it was not in my Power to deface : It threw me into fuch Reflections as generally fucceed exceffive Transports. Oh! unhappy Cafilda, cry'd I, what fubtil Poifon hath feiz'd thy Heart? Art thou fo tired with thy Liberty, that thou must lose it this Day? I know not who this is that feems fo Charming; I am well inform'd that he is in Love, and is belov'd, fince Donna Blanca, who is fo beautiful, tiful, is the Guardian of his Picture, which fhe show'd by her Uneasiness to be very dear to her. What hopes then can I have of any Relief, and to whom must I apply my felf a Shou'd not my Birth and Modefty be fufficient to impose Silence on me ? What ! cou'd I pronounce the Word I love, and pronounce it in Favour of a Man, who knows not the Value of fo great a Sacrifice : No, my Eyes shall fooner be Witnefs of my Rival's Victory, and I will die before I expose my felf to the Shame, which must needs fucceed fuch a Confession : But (faid I a Minute after) is it possible that in fuch a little Time, Love cou'd have made fo great a Progress ? I am forc'd to lay a Command on my felf, not to speak of my Weaknefs, and I have form'd a Rival without having a Lover.

I confess to you, Brother, this caus'd fo great a Change in me, that I began not to know my felf: I was continually Thoughtful; and Solitude was the only Thing I courted : I fear'd to discover my Pain, or seek for Means to know the Author of it. If I show this Picure, thought I, Donna Blanca will be inform'd I have it, and then I shall be oblig'd to return it; she is belov'd, and in so great Favour, that I dare not declare my Sentiments, much lefs contend with so dangerous a Rival.

Two Months were over before I cou'd hear any Thing relating to this Affair ; I fometimes enquired what young Lords were abfent; among others, they named Don Garcia, Don Pedro d'Avilas, d Avilas, and Don Frederick Henriquez: How cou'd I know whether the Man that posses'd my Thoughts, was either of them. I endeavour'd to be acquainted with their Character; but those, who were fo complaifant as to describe them to me, instead of giving me some light in the Matter, left me more in the dark and in greater Despair. I made it also my Business to discover, whether Donna Blanca had not a known Engagement, which I was perfuaded was the only Thing cou'd fatisfy me; but they told me, fhe was too imperious to receive the Address of any of the Gran-dees. I knew the contrary, tho' I was not at liberty to declare it; fo that I languish'd between finall Hopes and crucl Fears. Donna Blanca was taken ill of the Small-Pox at this Time, and there was a Necessity for her leaving the Court. I cannot help confelling that I was 'extreamly pleas'd at my Rival's Misfortune. Heavens! cry'd I, just Heaven! make her as ugly as poffible, that the Paffion of her Lover may turn to a mortal Aversion. The Thoughts of this gave me fome Ease, tho' I look'd upon my being in love with a Person I did not know, as the greatest Unhappiness that cou'd poffibly attend me. How wretched wou'd be my Fate, faid I to my felf, if this Picture with which I am fo charm'd, fhou'd only prove the Painter's Fancy, and that I fhou'd never fee its Original. I reflected at last on which wou'd give me the most Uneasines, to see Donna Blanca ador'd by him I lov'd, or never never to have hopes of feeing the Object of my Paílion. Thefe, in my Opinion, were two cruel Extremes; for I cou'd not determine my felf on either, and therefore concluded I was the most unfortunate Person in the World.

My Mind was in this Situation, when in the Queen's Apartment, thinking of the Odnefs of my Adventure, I went to the Window, from whence I faw two Noblemen, follow'd by many Attendants; the youngest of the Two fo perfectly refembled the Picture, that I did not at all doubt but he was the Original, already fo dear to me. In the first Motions of my Surprize I fetch'd fuch a Shriek, and threw open the Safh with fo much precipitation, that every Body took Notice of it; and tho' the Queen did not feem to mind it, the first Lady of the Bed-Chamber did, and reprimanded me feverely. I recover'd the Diforder I was in, as foon as poffible, and told her, I was deceiv'd by taking the young Lord for my Brother, whom I impatiently expected. The Affair pass'd in this manner, and I did all I cou'd to fuppress the Agitation, which might attend the first Sight of a Cavalier, whose Shadow had fo much difturb'd my Peace.

In fpite of all the Reflections I had made, I was feiz'd with fuch violent Emotions when the Admiral and his Son enter'd the Queen's Chamber, (for it was they) that I had like to have fwooned. Don Frederick Henriquez appear'd fo thoughtful, that I was griev'd to the Soul. I ought not to flatter my felf, faid I, that that Donna Blanca is indifferent to him ; In his Looks I read my Misfortune: He fympathizes with her in the Condition fhe is in, and thinks none here worth his Notice. Oh Barbarian ! (cry'd I to my felf) you think of nothing but your Mistres; cannot you turn your Eyes on me, and fee the deplorable State of wretched Cafilda ? But, Brother, I am afham'd (faid she, interrupting her felf) I am asham'd of unveiling my Weaknefs to you, and expofing to your Cenfure, Thoughts fo offenfive to the Modesty of my Sex. I shall only tell you, that the Queen came out of her Clofet, and the Ladies made a Circle about her, when the Admiral gave her an Account of her Naval Force: I refolv'd at that Inftant on a Thing that will appear to you no lefs bold than precipitate, which was to write to Don Henriquez; therefore without confulting Reafon. or confidering the Confequence, I took out my Tablettes, and addrefs'd him in these Terms

AFfairs wherein the Heart is concern'd, ought not to be defer'd; I deplore the Condition of yours. Give me an Opportunity of Speaking to you, and you shall be indebted to me for your Peace. Let Secrecy be the Proof of your Gratitude. At Night I shall expect you on the Terrace-Walk under the Window by Dian's Statue : I there shall acquaint you, my Lord, with some Circumstances in which you are particularly concern'd.

When I had finish'd my Letter, I was at a loss how to convey it to Don Henriquez; at F last, I refolv'd to trust the young Count of Oropez with it; his Post of being first Querry to the Queen, gave him (as you know) an Opportunity of entertaining us often : He had a great deal of Wit, and having on feveral Oc-cafions obferv'd his Diferetion, I made a Sign to him, and he came to me. I have assured one of the young Ladies (faid I to him) that you can keep a Secret, and hope you will anfwer my good Opinion of you. There is nothing in my power, Madam, reply'd he, that I wou'd not do, to convince you, I am not undeferving your generous Sentiments. It is not my Secret (faid I blufhing) I am going to in-truft you with, but that of my particular Friend, who has a mind to perplex Don Henriquez : She has just writ on my Tablettes, I defire you will find an Opportunity to make him read it, and do not forget to return them to me. I shall never neglect, Madam, the least of your Commands (reply'd he finiling) tho' I cannot fay, you have charg'd me with fo o-bliging a Commission as you wou'd have me think. One Word more, faid I, be affured, I am not concern'd in it; but notwithstanding, shall ever acknowledge the Fayour you do me in obliging my Friend. Oropez left me imme-diately, and acquitted himfelf of what I wish'd with great Addrefs; while he was with Don Henriquez, I was extremely uneafy at this im-prudent Step, but was not long fo, for Oropez came back with my Tablettes, where at the End of my Letter, I found this Anfwer.

I Never cou'd flatter my self that any Person was interested in the Concerns of my Heart, but now I am happier than I imagin'd. Tour Commands shall be exactly obey'd. I assure you of Secrecy; and as for Gratitude, it is the least Return I can make so much Generosity.

n provide and any and in Thefe Words fo agreeably flatter'd my Imagination, that I long'd for Night with the greatest Impatience; in the mean Time, I made a thousand Reflections which gave me hopes, and entertain'd me till' the appointed Hour. The Night was very dark, and hearing fome Body approach the Window, I threw up the Safh, and ask'd in a low Voice; Don Henriquez, is it you? Yes, Madam, (faid he) it is the Man in the World who is most indebted to you; but at the fame Time I cannot help faying, that the Advantage you have over me is too unequal, fince you know me, and I am not only unacquainted with you, but even a stranger to what induces you to favour me with this Interview. I will fatisfy you prefently (faid I, in a trembling Voice) and that you may not fuspect I fent for you hither on a frivolous Subject, know that I am Casilda Benavidez ; therefore, my Lord, do not use any Diffimulation, but tell me, upon Honour, whether you are still in Love with Donna Blanca; if you will not be fincere in this Confession. I have nothing farther to fay to you. Don Henriquez feem'd very much furpriz'd at the Queftion, and having paus'd a while, made me this Anfwer; F 2

fwer; Donna Blanca is fo charming, that her Chains are glorious; and fince you believe I am her Captive, I will not fcruple to own it. These Words threw me into a very great Confusion. What ! do you love that perfidious Creature, reply'd I, who has made a Sacrifice of you, and even dispos'd of your Picture to convince your Rival how indifferent you are to her ? With that I took a Light, which I had hid for fear of being discover'd, and obliging him to come nearer, I fhew'd him his Picture, and look'd at him fo tenderly, that he might have read my Thoughts. Don Henriquez, after having view'd it, turn'd his Eyes on me, and I perceiv'd the Surprize was agreeable to him; but as what I had told him was very unexpected, he ask'd me how I came to know that he lov'd Donna Blanca, and by what Misfortune he had forfeited her Efteem. I can eafily fatisfy you both these Questions, reply'd I; your Absence having banish'd you from your Miftrefs's Heart, Don Diego Cuniga made his Ad-dreffes to her, and was favourably receiv'd : His Father, you know, is one of the first Grandees, and the being very ambitious, eafily conceiv'd a Paffion for him, of which fhe cou'd not have given a greater Proof, than facrificing your Picture to him. His Vanity was fatisfy'd, but his Love, inftead of increasing by the Assurance he had of a Return, made him flight her, and even difcontinue feeing her, which the refented fo much, that it had like to have been the Caufe of her Death : He endeavour'd vour'd to perfuade me, I was the Occafion of it; for that if he had not feen me, Donna Blanca's Impression wou'd never have been effac'd: But as I had no Inclination to believe him, and did not give him so obliging an Audience as he us'd to receive, to alter my Disposition towards him, he brought me your Picture, told me every thing that pass'd when she gave it to him, and beg'd I wou'd accept it as an Evincement that he never more wou'd renew his Address to her.

Altho' I look'd on him as an unthinking young Gentleman, I took the Picture, and I proteft to you my only Motive for fo doing, was to undecive you in relation to your un-grateful Miftrefs; for tho' I had no Acquain-tance with you, I frequently heard fo much in your Praise, that it gave me no small Concern to fee you thus betray'd by a perfidious Woman, and therefore I refolv'd to do all in my Power to diffuade you from ever thinking of her more. I will take your Advice, Madam, (faid he, in a great Paffion) and Don Diego Cuniga shall find at his Return from Sevil, that if I am not a dangerous Rival, I am at least a troublesome Enemy; but, Madam, (continu'd he with a milder Voice,) I hope you will assist me in my Revenge on Donna Blanca ; you have been pleas'd to acquaint me with her Per-fidioufnefs, and I fwear, I am already difpos'd to have an Averfion for her : Were you but con-cern'd in my Intereft, I fhou'd certainly be re-ftor'd to my felf, which happy State I only. F 3 desire, defire, that I may be the more able to lay my Heart at your Feet: I dare affure you, Madam, that Conftancy has ever been my Virtue, and I am fo well acquainted with Love, that you will find in me a Paffion, if poffible, equal to your Beauty. It is too late (reply'd I finiling) to anfwer a Propofal which you wou'd not have made me, had you lefs reafon to be piqu'd; but as I am inclin'd to wifh, that your Words were fincere, it will be a Pleafure to me, when I find your Conduct engages me to determine in your Favour: In the mean Time, be very fecret in regard to what is paft; your Compliance in this will be an eafy way to eftablifh you in my Efteem.

I did not give Don Henriquez Time to make me an Answer, but parted from him with fo much Satisfaction, that I wou'd not have chang'd my Deftiny for that of a Queen : My Mind was all that Night imploy'd on pleafing Ideas. Donna Blanca is fick and abfent, thought I, and will not appear at Court of a long Time; it is possible her Sickness may deface her Charms, and a Mistress who is sufpected to be inconftant, having loft that Attractive, will find it a hard matter to justify her felf: Befides, I have admirably well fucceeded in my Stratagem : Don Henriquez is inclin'd to like me, and thinks he has Caufe enough to break off with her. What have I then to fear ? I shall have made the Conquest of his Heart before ever my Rival can be able to come and difpute it with me.

Į

I appear'd the Day following at Court in a rich Drefs, which every one admir'd, having a particular Interest in adorning my felf to the best Advantage ; and I dispos'd every Thing fo well, that Don Henriquez came and affured me, he had no reason to complain of his Mistres's Proceedings, and that he was fo entirely pleas'd at the Difcovery I had made him, that it lay wholly in my Power to render him the most constant of Lovers. This Declaration was attended with all the Courtship that cou'd be expected from a Man paffionately in Love. How great was my Felicity in those Days! I was blefs'd with all, that Love and Gallantry cou'd infpire. But, Oh Brother ! I am ready to die when I call thefe Things to mind, and have nothing now remaining but mortal Grief. Are you entirely disengag'd (faid 1 sometimes to him) and cou'd you resist Donna Blanca, shou'd she endeavour to regain your Heart? You must needs suspect my Sentiments, reply'd he, to question what I wou'd do in such an Occafion: I take Heaven to witnefs, charming Cafilda, that were she as constant as I cou'd have wish'd her, and more beautiful than ever she appear'd to me, I shou'd no longer confess her Power. Tho' his Protestations transported me, yet I had room to apprehend, that when he faw my Rival, a Difcovery might be made in which I fhou'd prove very unhappy. I fecretly reproach'd my felf with my Perfidiouf-nefs, and fear'd fome Punishment wou'd attend it, which was fufficient to make me uneafy ; therefore F 4

fore I press'd Don Henriquez to follicite his Father's Confent to our Marriage, that they might afterwards join in their Request to the Queen about it; which being once granted, I shou'd have no longer reafon to fear : He reprefented to me the fantastical Humour of the Admiral, but promis'd he wou'd apply himfelf with the greatest Care and Address, in order to prevail with him. These Affurances extremely flatter'd me, and I was expecting the Effects of them, when one Day the Queen went to take the Air in the Forest of Javalles, attended by her Ladies who were riding by her open Chaife; but we were hardly got to the Height of a little Hill, when we difcover'd in the Plain fome Men on Horfe-back which we knew to be Moors : They were engag'd with Spaniards, whom they charg'd fo vigoroufly, that we thought them in the greatest Danger : We faw at the fame time a Lady at the Foot of the Tree, appearing to us in a Swoon, with feveral Women about her, who, by their Actions, exprefs'd much Concern.

The Queen ftop'd at fome diftance, and faw this Engagement with great Uncafinefs; but Don Henriquez, who had follow'd us, came up to her, and defired leave to go and fuccour the Spaniards; which her Majefty having affented to, and commanded fome of her Guards to attend him; he attack'd the Moors with fo much Bravery, that the Scene was chang'd in an inftant, and they being no longer able to oppofe him, were oblig'd to fly for Safety. All this while while my fearful Thoughts were imploy'd on the Dangers he was expos'd to; I was praying for his Succefs, tho' already Conqueror; and as I obferv'd all his Actions with a watchful Eye, I faw him approach the Ladies, who were ftill frighten'd, tho' their Enemies were fled.

Don Henriquez had scarcely turn'd his Eyes towards them, when fpurring his Horfe, he rid full fpeed from the Place ; but perhaps he confider'd, that fo great a Slight to the Lady (who was Donna Blanca) might difpleafe the Queen, fuppofing fhe took Notice of it ; therefore his Politicks, or rather my inevitable Misfortune, forcing him to return, he went up to her, and alighting, faluted her very coldly; but what he faid what fo fhort and confus'd, that in fpight of her Attention, she cou'd not comprehend it. I owe you my Liberty (faid fhe) my Lord, for which I shall think my felf eternally oblig'd to you, tho' I am perfuaded you knew not in whofe Caufe you fought. No, Madam, (an-fwer'd he) I was a Stranger to whom I ren-der'd this Service: I proteft, that had I known how far you were concern'd, I fhou'd have had Occasion for all my Generofity to support me, in fighting for the most perfidious Person in the World. And for my part (reply'd Donna Blanca with an Air of Pride) I retract my Obligation, fince you confess your felf unworthy of being my Deliverer. She faid no more, because one of her Women was near, (from whom I had this Relation) but call'd for her Chaife, and went went to meet the Queen. Don Henriquez left her, and came up first to give her Majesty the Particulars of what had pass'd, and to let her know that it was Donna Blanca he had reliev'd, who had like to have been carry'd off by the Moors. At this Name I was Thunder-ftruck, and my Imagination contriv'd a thoufand Ways to torment me, representing all I had to fear from fo fatal a Rencounter. Can any Misfortune be equal to mine, faid I? Donna Blanca taken by the Moors, was going by her Captivity to deliver me from all the Alarms her Return cou'd be capable of giving me: She is refcu'd from this Danger, and owes her Safety to the Arm of Don Henriquez: I have now every thing to apprehend; he is just come from her, and I doubt has difcover'd my Treachery. I know not whether I deceive my felf, but his Looks tell me he loves her ftill. The Thoughts of her being inconftant might have cured him, but nothing can do it, if he is once convinc'd of her Innocence: I shall appear a Monster to him, and become the Object of his Averfion. Heavens ! what shall I do, if what I dread fhould happen ? Whether Don Henriquez would not talk to me for fear of being taken Notice of, or that he had no mind to it, I cannot tell, but he did not speak to me all that Day. Donna Blanca, who had not feen the Queen fince her Recovery from the Small-Pox, took that Opportunity to kifs her Hand. I was inconfolable to find her as handfome as ever, and her Praise the Subject of every one's Discourse, whilf whilft I, as filent as Death, was observing Don Henriquez, who I thought did a Violence to his Inclination, in not approaching her. They appear'd both in fome Confusion, yet their Eyes seem'd to express more Love than Anger. None but a Rival cou'd have known the Cause of these different Motions; but Oh! nothing escap'd my penetrating Jealousfy: I read in their Looks (as I imagin'd) my eternal Ruin. The Queen was return'd to Villa Real, and

The Queen was returned to Villa Real, and I in her Apartment before I knew where I was, or even which way I came : I was loft in Melancholy, and thought it was very cruel in Don Henriquez not to fhew the leaft Concern for me. What ! (faid I) is his Paffion come to this ? He who has render'd Donna Blanca fo effential a Service, and knows I apprehend nothing more than a Relapfe; does he thus neglect giving me Affurances of the contrary ? I pafs'd all that Night in the greateft Anxiety; and tho' I found my felf indifpos'd in the Morning, I rofe early, and went to the Queen's Apartment, fearing fomething might happen there prejudicial to my Intereft.

Donna Blanca appear'd at Court that Day finely drefs'd, and fo beautiful, that all but Leonida yielded to her. Don Henriquez was just by me when my Rival enter'd the Chamber. Heavens! Madam, faid he, how handfome si ! What Pity it is she is false. Why shou'd her Falsity affect you, my Lord, (reply'd I) fince at present she ought to be indifferent to you. It is true, Madam, (answer'd he sighing) 76.

fighing) but I only deplore the Misfortune of those who wear her Chains. You are very charitable, faid I, and the Publick is much indebted to you. Here fuch a Crowd of various Thoughts prefented themfelves to me, that I was at a lofs how to continue my Difcourfe; and Don Henriquez, without enquiring into the Caufe of my Silence, had his Eyes fix'd on Donna Blanca. What's this! cry'd I ? you appear to me different from what you were Yefterday; Do you repent of having chang'd your Mind, and are you still Slave enough to love that perfidious Creature ? Don't you remember that she facrific'd you to a Man of no Merit, which made me bluth for her, as much as I do now for you? At this he interrupted me, and faid, Indeed Cafilda you must know me very little to frame fuch injurious Sufpicions : There is not a Man in the World who refents an ungenerous Ufage more than I; and let me affure you, that after I have loaded her with Reproaches, equal, if possible, to the Offence, I will not only flow an Indifferency for her, but even defpife her to fuch a degree, that you shall have no reason to complain of my future Conduct.

He pronounc'd thefe last Words fo faintly, that I was confounded. What ! faid I, do you want to come to an Eclariciffement with Donna Blanca; you cou'd do no more were fhe a Pattern of Tendernefs and Conftancy? I fuppofe, added J, you wou'd have no Value for fuch a Mistrefs. But give me leave to tell you, my my Lord, that if you fpeak to her, I will never fee you more. He was furpriz'd at thefe Words, and look'd at me a great while, endeavouring to penetrate into the Caufe of this Refolution. He call'd to mind what Donna Blanca had faid to him, which gave him Sufpicion enough to increafe his Curiofity; and tho' he promis'd to comply with my Commands, he did it with fo indifferent an Air, that I could no ways doubt of my Misforfortune.

I went from the Queen's Apartment into my own, and flung my felf upon my Bed, half dead and drowned in Tears. Soon after Leonida came into my Chamber, who faw my Concern and Diftraction, which wanted very little of Defpair, and fitting by me, did all fhe cou'd to foften my Grief, without knowing the Cause of it: But to disburden my Mind of part of its Depression, I gave her an Account of what had pass'd : As the had never been in Love, and confequently unacquainted with what one in that State is capable of, fhe cou'd not help condemning my Treachery to my Rival. Oh! Leonida, faid I, you little know the Effects of a violent Passion; every Thing is allow'd to Lovers, when they are in pursuit of a Heart: Say rather, reply'd fhe, that we often allow to our felves many Things which are very blameable. If I have committed a Crime, faid I, my Punishment is near. Alas ! I was not mistaken : Don Henriquez had found an Opportunity to speak to Donna Blanca; his Impression was not quite quite effac'd, whatever reafon the might have had to complain of his Behaviour. They accufed each other, and by that means difcover'd the Part I had acted. I leave you to think, Brother, whether they were not reconciled at my Expence. I was not long before I knew my Fate; for Henriquez came, and upbraided me with my Perfidioufnefs. I wou'd have perfuaded him he was still captivated by Donna Blanca, and that by her artful Infinuations, fhe had prevail'd, and impos'd on him; but the ill Opinion he had of me, prevented his believing it. As I knew his Temper, I thought I cou'd not do better than confess the Motive which had incited me to make him quarrel with his Mistrefs. Judge the Condition I was in, dear Brother, when I own'd that Love was the Occafion of my Guilt, and expos'd my Weaknefs, which I was then fure wou'd meet with a fatal Return. I fought for Reafons to excufe my Crime, by painting my Paffion in the most lively Colours, and my Tears convinc'd him of the Truth of what I faid. He heard me without the least Interruption, but at last look'd at me with attention, and affuming an imperious Air; I think my felf fufficiently reveng'd of your Treachery, faid he, fince you love me, and I have no Thoughts of you but what are defpiling; in finishing these Words, he left me. The Anger, Shame, and Grief which divided my Soul, had like to have immediately ended my unhappy Life ; but Leonida came to me at that Time and us'd her Endeavours to confole confole me, without the least Success. I was meditating the Ruin of Donna Blanca and Henriquez, and felt in my felf fuch a difposition for a defperate Undertaking, that nothing but the natural Sweetness of my Friend's Temper cou'd moderate my Rage. My Rival, tho' victorious, wou'd not refolve to pardon me; fhe complain'd to her Mother, who was weak enough to enter into her Sentiments as a Confident, and ever fince they have watch'd all Opportunities for Revenge. I have, by their means, forfeited the Queen's Favour, and meet every Day with fo many Subjects of Grief, as would deprive me of Life, cou'd any Thing be capable of it, but the Lofs of the ungrateful Henriquez. I heard Yesterday, that Leonora had prevail'd with the Queen to propose a Match to the Admiral between Donna Blanca and his Son, and that he had given his Confent to it : I shall foon fee her triumph : judge then----- Here Cafilda cou'd no longer restrain her Sighs and Tears, which oblig'd her to be filent. Benavidez, who was extremely touch'd with her Affliction, told her, he wou'd fight Don Henriquez, and neglected nothing which he thought cou'd lessen her Pain ; but as that which affects the Heart is very different from any other, fo it requires more Time for its Cure. We shall find notwithstanding, in the Sequel of Cafilda's Story (defpairing as fhe was) that many Years were not expired before fhe found Confolation. taller in fine a non to be per soil

Benavidez gave his Sifter an Account of what had pass'd between him and the Prince of Carency, and told her, he must needs have Leonida's Picture, for he had thought of an Expedient to make her have a great Averfion for her Lover; but that he wou'd not declare his Paffion to her, till he was affured fhe had fome Confidence in him; for which reafon he beg'd Cafilda to follicite his Interest, who promis'd to act for him to the utmost of her Power : Accordingly she defired Madam Velasco to let her Daughter sit for her Picture, which, in Opposition to the young Lady, was immediately granted, and given to Benavidez; who caus'd another to be drawn, but with fo aukward an Air, that none could fee it without having a difdain for the Original. This was the Picture he fent by an Express to the Prince, with a Letter at the fame Time, telling him, that that Piece wou'd flow how charming the Perfon was whom Fate had decreed him, fince it was her perfect Likenefs; and that he had entertain'd her with his Merit, but fhe hardly wou'd have Patience to hear any thing on that Subject ; which convinc'd him, her Thoughts were imploy'd on fome other Object.

The Prince, who gave too much Credit to Benavidez, was firuck with fuch Confusion at the fight of this Picture and Letter, that he immediately wrote to him, and without any Caution, confess'd the Cruelty of fo unhappy an Alliance, and his Aversion for Leonida. But as she had fome reason to be perfuaded that her her Picture wou'd produce a contrary. Effect ; she often ask'd Benavidez, out of a Motive of Self-love, whether he had heard from him, and what was his Opinion of her; therefore, as foon as he had receiv'd the Prince's Anfwer; (which was writ in fuch Terms as overjoy'd him, being that nothing more difobliging cou'd be added) he contriv'd, that Cafilda shou'd show it Leonida with fuch an Air of Secrecy, as if he were no ways confenting to it. The thing was carry'd on as he had design'd it. Leonida read the Prince's Letter, at which the was fo offended, that the immediately went and threw her felf at her Mother's Feet, and conjured her with Tears to break off a Marriage, which wou'd render her the most unfortunate Creature in the World. I will not pretend, Madam, to difobey you in any thing, faid fhe, but is it poffible that you your felf wou'd occasion my Ruin ? Tho' I have but little Experience in the Sentiments one ought to have for a Hufband; yet it appears to me, that without mutual Love nothing but continual Torment can be expected ; for how can I value the Man you have chosen for me, fince he has not only conceiv'd an Aversion for me, but thinks me ugly and defpifes me ? Cannot you change my Fate, Madam ? Oh! rather let me never marry, or if you are not pleas'd I shou'd live with you, fend me to a Monastry; I will sooner embrace that State of Life, than be united to a Prince for whom I have no Inclination. Madam Velasco, mov'd at her Daughter's Com-G plaint.

plaint, took her feveral Times in her Arms, and endeavour'd to confole her in a most tender manner. If it wholly depended on me, my dearest Child, (faid she) I wou'd soon ease your Mind; but your Father is my Lord, and we are both fo far bound in Duty to comply with his Pleafure, that I cannot promife you any thing till I know what are his Intentions. As the had ended these Words, Don John of Velasco enter'd the Chamber; the Mother and Daughter flung themfelves at his Feet, and with Prayers and Tears, conjured him to break off with the Prince: They flow'd him the Letter he had written to Benavidez, but all wou'd not do ; Don John was determin'd to keep his Word with him, even at the Expence of his Daughter's Happinefs. He anfwer'd them, that the Contract was figned, and nothing should ever make him revoke a thing he had concluded with the late Count of La March ; to Leonida withdrew in the greatest Affliction, and having inform'd Cafilda of her Father's Sentiments, told her, fhe was refolv'd to retire into a Monastry. That will be no effectual Relief to you, (reply'd Cafilda malicioufly) for a Man who hath fo much Power as Don John, will eafily oblige his Daughter to quit a Place, wherein she had thrown her felf without his Consent : But, my dear Leonida, your Grief is fo moving, that I have already propos'd Means to give you fome Comfort. My Brother, who is entirely devoted to your Service, and in whom you may faithfully confide, has a fine Houfe

House near Carmona; it is an agreeable Retirement, furrounded with spacious Woods. I. will go and live with you there. What, my dear Cafilda, (interrupted Leonida) is your love for me fo great as to quit the Court? I cou'd make you a greater Sacrifice (reply'd Cafilda fighing) you know the reasons I have to hate this fatal Place: The falle Henriquez will foon be marry'd to Donna Blanca ; I shall have nothing before my Eyes but what will increase my Defpair; and in spite of my Pride and Reafon, I cannot ceafe loving that cruel Man, tho' he glories in my Weaknefs. Abfence is the only thing that can efface his Idea; let us go, charming Leonida, (continued fhe) let us fly the Man I love, and him you hate. My Fate is more deplorable than yours, reply'd Leonida, your Absence will procure you some Eafe, and no Body will purfue you; but as for my part, I shall be pursued, and perhaps difcover'd, and brought back to my Father's House, where I shall meet with very fevere Ufage. Ah! how little do you know the fad Condition I am reduc'd to, cry'd Cafilda, do you think it a Confolation to tell me, that no Body will purfue me? That is the chief Caufe of my Grievance : I cou'd with the perfidious Henriquez wou'd abandon all, and follow me; Heavens ! how transported shou'd I be ! If you propose to enjoy a perfect Tranquillity, reply'd Leonida, do not harbour any Wishes so contrary to your Peace. Alas I know not what to wish (faid Casilda,) then let us go; Solitude G 2 and and Absence may chance to give some Ease to my Mind. Young Leonida, who had but little Experience, and did not foresee the fatal Consequences of such an Undertaking, confented to the dangerous Proposals of her Companion : She embrac'd her a thousand Times, and confess'd in a most tender manner, her Obligation for the considerable Service some was going to render her. They afterwards agreed on a Day and Hour to execute their Project, and imploy'd all their Thoughts in taking such Measures as cou'd make it succeed.

This was the State of Affairs when they were inform'd, that the Count of La March was arriv'd at Seville with a magnificent Attendance; and a Body of Eight Hundred Men to fuccour the Infanta Don Fernand, who was then at War with the Moors. The Virtue and eminent Qualities of this illustrious. Prince were foon publish'd in Spain, and the Prince of Ca+ rency, his Brother, had no finall Share in the general Applause :... He had accompany'd the Count to Seville, from whence he intended to go to Villa Real, in order to marry Leonida : but Fortune was preparing long Torments for him, inftead of those Pleasures he wou'd have tafted, in the Poffeffion of a Lady fo charming and virtuous.

The Prince wrote a Letter to Benavidez, to acquaint him with his departure from Seville, which he immediately communicated to Leonida. She now thought it Time to be gone, and without farther Confideration, trufted her felf felf (with Cafilda) to the Conduct of Benavi-dez, who over-joy'd and full of Hopes, omitted nothing that was necessary in this Affair. They left Villa Real, and he accompany'd them fome part of the Way; but fearing his Absence from the Court at the Time of their difappearing, might-give fome Sufpicion of his having a hand in it, he defired Leonida and his Sifter to accept of one of his Friends, who fhou'd wait on them to their Journey's End, being a Man whofe Fidelity was fo well known to him, that he ran no Rifque in trufting him with his Miffrefs and Sifter.

Benavidez express'd much Concern in parting from Leonida, who might have eafily perceiv'd it, had not her Thoughts been imploy'd otherways. He took his leave of them, and they continued their Journey with all the Diligence and Secrecy possible. When they were arriv'd at Benavidez's Houfe, where no Body knew them, they chang'd their Names; Leonida call'd her felf Felicia, and Cafilda took the Name of Beatricia, faying they were Sifters, and of the House of Leon.

The Gentleman who had accompany'd them, return'd to Villa Real, and gave an Account to Benavidez of their fuccessful Journey, whilft the young Ladies were taking the innocent Pastime of an agreeable Solitude.

Benavidez, notwithstanding the Impatience he had to fee. Leonida, appear'd at Court with a counterfeit Air of Gaiety. But Heavens ! in what Affliction were Don John of Velafco and his his Lady, when they perceiv'd their Daughter was gone: They believ'd at first, that she and Cafilda were retired to a Monastry, and Benavidez feem'd to believe the fame; faying, That that was the only reafon, which prevented him from fearching all Spain, in order to find his Sifter. Don John, who had greater Caufe for Uneafinefs, imploy'd all Means to difcover the Place where Leonida might be; but his Enquiry being to no purpofe, he was almost in Defpair. Benavidez the mean while was proposing to himfelf no flender Share of Happinets in the Succefs of an Enterprize he had manag'd fo artfully; but the Queen being then inform'd that fome Grandees of Spain, who were diffatisfy'd with the Government, were carrying on a traiterous Defign, and had refolv'd to deliver up fome confiderable Towns to the King of Granada, she order'd, that Benavidez (who was Governour of one of those Places, and had been impeach'd, tho' Innocent,) should be taken up. This unexpected Blow, threw him into a desperate Condition; he fear'd, it had been difcover'd that Leonida was at his Houfe, and that he was arrefted on that Account; but when they told him that it was for High Treafon, he thought himfelf too happy, and feem'd less mov'd for the Loss of his Life, than the lofing of Leonida; however, his being prevented from going to fee her, increas'd his Grief to fuch a Degree, that he cou'd not conceal it from his Guards, which made them conclude him guilty. : 0

The Prince of Carency arriv'd at this time at Villa-Real; and did not know what to think of the many Reports he heard. The flight of Leonida and Cafilda, Benavidez's Imprisonment, and the distracted Condition of Don John of Velasco and his Lady, as well as his Concern for a Perfon to whom he was contracted, and the Neceffity he was under of using his utmost Endeavours to find her, together with his Indifferency for her; all thefe united, perfectly confounded him. He made an ineffectual Attempt to fpeak to Benavidez, who was fo strictly guarded, that he judg'd the Affair he was accus'd of wou'd meet with no Favour, if once convicted, unlefs the Queen's Goodnefs wou'd prevail with her Justice. He heard that Leonora was her Favourite, and having a firong Inclination to be ferviceable to his Friend, he made his Court to this old Lady, who, tho' as proud as great, cou'd-not but conceive a particular Efteem for the Prince. Don John and his Lady were fo charm'd with him; that their Satisfaction wou'd have been compleated, had not his Prefence renew'd all the Grief which the Lofs of Leonida occasion'd; fo that nothing cou'd moderate the Affliction of these disconsolate Parents.

The Prince of Carency was prefented to the Queen, who received him with a Refpect equal to his Birth and Merit. Donna Leonora used to fpeak fo often to her of his fine Qualities, that fhe foon perceiv'd her Favourite look'd on him with an obliging Eye, and that he triumph'd in in her Efteem over the other Princes and Grandees of the Court. He conftrain'd himfelf as much as poffible to oblige her, being invited by no other Motive than to ferve Benavidez. Oh ! had he known, that he was working for the greatest of his Enemies, and one who was endeavouring his Ruin, he wou'd have left him to his evil Genius.

One Day as the Queen was walking in the Palace-Gardens, attended by most of the Court, Donna Leonora affected to keep at some distance, which the Prince of Carency perceiving, he went and faluted her ; fhe receiv'd him very gracioufly, and ask'd him if he wou'd go with her into a green Arbour that was not far : After he had return'd her Compliment, he led her to the Place, where being fet down, fhe fpoke to him in this manner. Do you take this Opportunity I give you, my Lord, of entertaining me, as a Favour I feldom grant to any ? Your Youth, Wit and Quality are fufficient Motives to make you admired; but as I have no Inducements to create a Paffion, be fo kind as to tell me, from whence proceeds the defire you have of converfing with me, Is it the Effect of a Sympathy, that is frequently found between two Hearts, and for which no reafon can be affign'd ? The Prince was very much furpriz'd at what he heard, but still had almind to obtain her Favour on the Account of Benavidez, without intending to make any Declaration that might diffinguish a Lover from a Friend. He look'd at her some time as one

one aftonish'd, which entirely confounded Leonora. You ought, Madam, (faid he) to be convinc'd, that you have highly oblig'd me in condefcending to this Interview; which is an Honour I have this long time wish'd for ; but if you will give me leave to improve this Occafion, let it be in behalf of the unfortunate Benavidez: I know the Queen has fo just an Opinion of your good Senfe, that the will readily affent to any thing you are pleas'd to promote : Grant him your Protection, it is the greatest Favour I can ask. Your Petition is not very great (reply'd Leonora, in an angry Tone) when you imploy for another the Opportunity you ought to embrace for your felf : Is it possible, my Lord, that you can think of your Friend's Interest, and neglect your own ? Oh! I fee too well, that I am deceiv'd : there can be no Paffion where there appears fo much Indifferency. This embarafs'd the Prince more than ever any Thing had done, yet he try'd to conquer himfelf, and taking her by the Hand; You know very little, Madam, (faid he) the Language of my Eyes, when you form fo ill a Judgment of my Sentiments, as to doubt of my Paffion: Your Charms are the only Subject of my Contemplation, and the Fear of offending you was the Caufe of my Silence. This obliging Confidence, my Lord ! reply'd fhe, equally flatters my Vanity and Love; for I cou'd not think my felf fo happy in your Fayour: I am infinitely pleafed at the Confession you have made me, and 1337

and fince you wou'd have me ferve Benavidez, I promife you to do it effectually; whether he be innocent or guilty, lie fhall be fet at Liberty. The Prince made his Retributions to her in fo grateful a manner, that fhe was perfectly charm'd with him: but as he was tired with this difagreeable Converfation, he impatiently rofe up and took his Leave.

When he was alone, he abandon'd himfelf to those Reflections which were most painful to him. Heaven, just Heaven! cry'd he, what am I referv'd for? I find my felf intangled in an Amour with the ugliest of Women, and who is the only one that ever gave me a favourable Audience. Oh! I love my Unknown at Nicopolis, and Olympia's Memory is still dear to me. Leonida, prevented by fome Fatality, has chosen rather to fly her Father's House, than yield to his Commands. Now must I, to ferve my Friend, counterfeit a Passion for this Favourite, who is an Object fitter to inspire Aversion, than a more obliging Sentiment.

Tho' he reproach'd the Cruelty of his Fate, yet he did not omit paying his Devoirs every Day to Leonora, whofe Paffion rofe to that Violence at laft, that the determin'd to marry him, which was the thing in the World he leaft thought of. She fent to him, and defired he wou'd come to her; which having obey'd; my Lord, faid fhe, if in the Profeffion you have made me there is more Truth than Complaifance, and that you are touch'd as much as you you wou'd persuade me, you cannot give me a greater Proof of it; than by uniting your Defliny with mine. I will not trouble you with a Detail of my Birth and Fortune, all Spain can inform you of both ; but shall content my felf with affuring you that you will find in me fo good a Friend in becoming your Wife -----My Wife! have you fuch a thought (cry'd the Prince, interrupting her.) Here he was filent, but perceiving his Miftake, he endeavour'd to recover it, and assuming a tender Air; fuch an Alliance, Madam, faid he, wou'd infinitely please me, if I were not engag d to Leonida, and you know it is not in my Power to retract my Promife. No, cruel as you are : I know nothing; (interrupted Leonora, in a furious manner) I faw your Surprize and Horror at a Propofal you are not worthy of; you have not only deceived me, but have alfo deceiv'd your felf. Know, Sir, that in this Kingdom, you must not dare to offend a Person of my Quality unpunish'd, especially one who has as much Power as the Queen : Benavidez shall be my first Victim, and take care (perfidious as you are) that you be not the Second. In finishing thefe Words, she gave him a menacing Look, went into her Clofet, and fhut the Door with great Violence, leaving the aftonish'd Prince in her Chamber.

He immediately went to Madam Velasco's, and without any Referve, acquainted her with all that had pais'd. You may be well affured, Madam, faid he, that were I not even contracted tracted to Leonida, I wou'd sooner chuse to dye than marry a Woman, who by her Cruelties, is become odious to all Spain. I know her Birth and Fortune are equally great, but I defpife them both; therefore give me your Advice, Madam, and tell me, what Meafures I must take to deliver my felf from this Monster, without exposing the Life of Benavidez. That is a harder Task than you imagine, (reply'd Madam Velasco) the violent Temper of this Woman has already facrific'd many, and I tremble for you : The Queen loves her to fuch a degree, that fhe will blindly condefeend to all her Defires. Alas, my Lord, why are you in Spain ? Or why are you not the Husband of Leonida ? With this she burst out into a Flood of Tears. You weep, Madam, faid he, and I have reason to believe you are concern'd for me. Do you think this Affair will have any other Confequence, than my being oblig'd to quit Villa Real? I am no Subject of Spain, neither is a Man of my Rank to be infulted. without Revenge; and I am affured, that if Leonora fees me no more, fhe will foon forget me. Then prepare to depart, my dear Son, (reply'd Madam Velasco, embracing him tenderly) I will take my Daughter with me into France if she is living, and nothing shall alter the Refolution I have taken to make her eternally yours, and a start of mance : He was in hopes, that either Leonida wou'd not be found, or that her Aversion for him wou'd continue ; in which Case; the Marriage of Course must needs break off, and he wou'd be no longer under the Obligation of executing his Father's Commands. He immediately took leave of Don John of Velasco, being refoly'd to go away the same Night, in order to join the Count of La March (his Brother) who was waiting at Seville for the Infanta Don Fernand, to march against the Moors.

He retired early to his Apartment, and gave Orders, that all things flou'd be ready for his Journey; but Leonora (who had Spies over the Prince's Actions) was foon acquainted with his fudden Refolution; and feeing fhe had no Means left to prevail with him, ran and threw her felf at the Queen's Feet, conjuring her with Tears in her Eyes, to take pity of her Weaknefs. The Prince of Carency is parting, Madam, faid she; he abandons me, and I shall be the wretchedest Creature in the World, without your Majesty is pleas'd to protect me. The hopes of being his Wife, (flatter'd by his Affiduity and faithlefs Protestations) made fo deep an Impression on me, that it was not in my Power to decline a Passion, which wou'd have united our Destinies: But the Traitor has deceiv'd me, and I am going to lofe him for ever; unless you give immediate Orders to have him feiz'd. What Pretence cou'd I have to act in that manner, (reply'd the Queen, with that Complaifance which was usual 'to: her) he is con-contracted to Leonida, and Don John of Velafco is in great Power : He has Friends and Relations in this Court, and shou'd I undertake to break his Daughter's Contract in favour of you, It wou'd be doing him the greatest Injustice. Befides, with what Authority cou'd I do it ? I have no Power over that young Prince : Don't you know he is related to the King of France, and that a Man of his Quality is not to be dealt with like other People ; then confider, that the Count of La March, his Brother, is actually at Seville, and is Son-in-Law to the King of Navarre; all these Things are to be weighed with Deliberation. Ah Madam ! reply'd Leonora, I do not intend to expose your Majesty when I intreat you to detain the Prince ; you have a good Pretence to do it, without my appearing any ways concern'd. There is an intimate Friendship between him and Benavidez, and wou'd it not be fufficient to make the World understand, that the Prince has a Hand in the Rebellion ? Your Authority dif penses you from giving an Account of your Actions, and who dares inquire into your Conduct? The Prayers and Tears of this old Favourite prevail'd at last with the Queen, and fhe confented that a Captain of the Guards should go immediately, and put the Prince under Arreft; which was no fooner executed, but the Queen had him brought before her, and having order'd every Body to withdraw, fpoke to him in these Terms;" What, my Lord, faid fhe, cou'd one have thought you capable 113 of

of betraying us; and that under the Notion of a Friend, you were privately confpiring with thole, who intended to deliver up fome Towns of this Kingdom to the Barbarians? Don'r pretend, Prince, to fay any thing in your Defence, for nothing can jultify you: I am too well inform'd of your Intreagues; fo prepare your felf to undergo the Punishment you deferve: Your eminent Birth will not protect you without my Favour, and if I grant you your Life, it shall at least be at the Expence of your Liberty. Donna Leonora loves you, my Lord, and has already interceded for Grace; if you will marry her, I may in regard to her, forget the pernicious Defigns you had form'd against this Kingdom.

The Prince heard, with all the Refpect imaginable, what the Queen had to fay; then anfwer'd her with a noble and undauated Air; My Heart is incapable, faid he, of forming for mean a Defign, as that which your Majefty lays to my Charge, and I have too much Intereft in juftifying myfelf to confent that you fhould forget my Crime in Confideration of Leonora. No, Madam, I refuse the Mercy you offer me, and demand nothing but Juffice; which I have no Caufe to fear be it ever for fevere. Go then, Prince, faid the Queen, you fhall be ftrictly guarded, and feverely punifhed if guilty.

He was conducted from thence, to the fame Caftle where Benavidez was Prisoner, and confin'd feveral Days, with Orders that no Body fhould 96 fhould be admitted to him: However, this Affair could not be carry'd on with fo much Secrecy, but that Don John of Velafco was informed how ill they ufed the Prince, for whom he had fo great a Value. He addrefs'd himfelf to the Queen about it in very warm Terms, and even threatned her with the King of France's Refentment; but fhe was refolv'd to venture at all, and fhow no favour to him, unlefs he marry'd Leonora

This imperious Favourite (who was the only Person that had leave to fee the Prince) came one Night into his Chamber, richly adorn'd with Jewels, but fo frightful as to her Perfon, that he could liardly prevail with himfelf to look at her. Nothing shall be impof-fible to me (faid she, my lovely Prince, taking him by the Hand) I have every thing in my Power, and if you will marry me, I promife to deliver you out of this horrible Prifon; but if you are too proud, and defpife me, be af-fured, you shall pass the rest of your Days here, or end your Life in a more tragick Man-ner. Ha! (continued she, perceiving in his Countenance a great deal of Anger mix'd with difdain) Do you conceive lefs Horror for the Block, than for my Perfon? I am not young I confess; yet such as you see me, I can make the Felicity of the greatest Princes in Spain, who daily offer me their Siglis and Vows, which with mine I facrifice to you. See, my my dear Prince! See, what a fhameful part you make me act; I blufh in confessing my Weak-

Weaknefs, and your Obligation to me ought to be the greater: I, who make all the Court tremble, am here before you, like a Victim, uncertain of Life or Death, waiting its Doom ; fay then, will you decide my Fate? You are the only Man that can make me happy, and without you, I am for ever wretched. Whilft Leonora was speaking, the Prince of Carency felt fo violent an Averfion for her, that he cou'd hardly command his Paffion ; but having overcome it a little, he faid, with a very indifferent Air : Are you not yet fatisfy'd with what you make me fuffer, and will you for ever perfecute me with a Paffion, to which I can make no Return ? I declare, that in my Thoughts, the Misfortune of being belov'd by you, is one of the greatest that could happen to me; and fince my Sincerity offends you, purfue your Rage, and let your Vengeance fall on a Man, who can reproach himfelf with no other Crime, but that of having given you room for fome Time, to believe he cou'd like you. After these Words, he was filent, and whatever she cou'd fay to him, he wou'd not make her any Anfwer.

She ran out of his Chamber like a Fury, threat'ning him with fpeedy Death, and from thence, went directly to fee Benavidez, who was very uneafy (as one may well conceive) having been difappointed in his Defign relating to Leonida, and not knowing whether she was still at his House, or whether, since his Con-finement, her Father had not found her out, H and and marry'd her to the Prince of Carency; befides, he cou'd not tell but the Crime he was accus'd of, tho' innocent, might coft him his Life.

These Reflections were tormenting him, when he faw Leonora coming into his Chamber; he cou'd not imagine the Caufe of fo un-, expected a Favour, and just as he was going to make his Retributions to her, she began in these Terms. Benavidez (faid she, with a Voice that express'd the Motions of her Soul). your Life or Death now depends on the best of your Friends; you are impeach'd, and believed guilty : The Prince of Carency, who loves you entirely, is actually a Prifoner with you in this Castle, and I am willing to-let you know, that I have conceiv'd a particular Efteem for that Prince ; you shall have leave to. fee him, and be fure you use your utmost Endeavours to perfuade him to marry me, in which Cafe, I answer for your Liberty; but otherwife, you will have Caufe to fear both for him, and your felf; Farewel. Remember. now, that your Interest and mine must be the fame. After having fpoke to him in this manner, the gave him no time to make any An-fwer, but went away with great Precipitation.

Benavidez, who before was defpairing, cou'd not hear this News without being extremely pleas'd: He refolv'd to ufe his utmoft Addrefs in perfuading the Prince; and as he knew the Influence he had over him, he flatter'd himfelf with with eafily overcoming all Difficulties. What a Happiness will it be, cry'd he, if he yields to Leonora's Defires; I shall then be fure of my charming Leonida, and this Favourite, whom I shall oblige, will in Gratitude imploy her Credit to make her mine. I find, it is not, as yet, known where the is; my Houfe has this Treasure still in its Possession, and asson as I obtain my Liberty, I will go and vifit her in her Retirement. After having imploy'd his Thoughts on fo agreeable a Change of Fortune, he could not help reproaching himfelf with the treacherous Part he had acted towards his Friend and Leonida No, faid he, I shall never enjoy a real Felicity, fince I must be oblig'd to deceive two Perfons, who fo entirely deferve my Affection, and will be inconfolable, when they come to know one another, to find their Deftiny chang'd by my Perfidioufnefs. These Reflections gave him fome Concern; but as his Love transcended his Friendship, he resolv'd to arm himself against all Remorfe.

Whilft he expected, with great Impatience, to fpeak with the Prince of Carency, Don John of Velafeo was using all his Endeavours to get him out of Prison. He at last brib'd one of the Guards, who having brought Ropes and a File, help'd to cut the Bars of his Window; and the Night being very dark, they both efcap'd on Horses that were waiting for them.

But this could not be done fo fecretly, as not to alarm fome of the Guards, who heard a Noife in the Prince's Apartment, which they enter'd, and perceiving his Flight, went immediately to give Notice of it to Leonora. This News made her furious. She order'd feveral Horfemen, who were all devoted to her Intereft, to purfue him; and was fo confounded, that without knowing what the faid, the commanded them to take different Ways, and told 'em, that in cafe they overtook him, and cou'd not prevail with himpito return; they shou'd kill him : But after they had left her, and the first Effects of her Pallion were over, the reflected on the cruel Commands the had given; and did not at all doubt but they wou'd be too well executed by those Villains. What ! cry'd fhe, am I going to be the Murderer, of a Man, for whom I wou'd willingly lay down my Life ; and do I convey the Poinyard to his Breaft? Oh, unjuft Fate! Why are you not contented with taking from me, the Object I love, without making me the Author of his Death? Being thus prepoffefs'd with difmal Thoughts, the was no more Miffrefs, of her felf; the fent immediately to countermand her inhuman Orders; but alas! it was too late. they had kill'd the Prince in fpite of his brave. Refiftance, which was fo great, that he wou'd not have been overcome but by a vaft Superiority.

Leonora was faluted with this News at Villa-Real, which fhe receiv'd as one who already expected it, and had no other Thought, but that of dying. The Prayers and Tears of the Queen

Queen were of no force. Slie tore her Hair and wounded her Face, and her extreme Grief foon forwarded her Death, which made fome Atonement for the Barbarity she had just caus'd to be acted on one of the finest Princes in the World. all the case I percent of a per of a children of

Don Fohn of Velasco and his Lady were inconfolable for his Lofs, reproaching themfelves for not giving him a fufficient Guard; they regretted him as if he had been their own Child, and loaded with Imprecations the Memory of Leonora. Benavidez not being fo ftrictly guarded as before, was foon inform'd of the Prince's Death; but his Love triumph'd over his Gratitude, which made him perfectly infenfible of the Misfortune of a Perfon, who had lov'd him fo entirely. Photo and allowed Whilft thefe Things were paffing at Court, Leonida and Cafilda, under the Names of Felicia and Beatricia, were ftrangely alarm'd in their Solitude; the Gentleman who had left them fafe there, acquainted them with Benavidez's being made a Prifoner of State, and accus'd of having a Correspondence with the Moors. Cafilda at this News, was refolv'd to go back to Villa-Real, in order to intetcede for her Brother, and do him what Service fhe was capable of; but Leonida, who fear'd to remain there alone, reprefented to her, that as Leonora was not her Friend, and that through her means, fhe had already loft the Queen's Favour, her Prefence instead of mending her Brother's Affairs, would make them worfe; that bebefides, fhe wou'd have the Mortification of feeing Henriquez marry'd to Donna Blanca, which wou'd only renew her Grief: Thefe Arguments wou'd not have prevail'd with Cafilda, had fhe not apprehended, that in leaving Leonida, who in the mean Time might return to her Father's Houfe, Benavidez wou'd lofe all the Fruits of her artificial Management; which Confideration prevented her Journey.

Leonida and Cafilda us'd often to walk in a Foreft near their Houfe; and one Evening, as they were fitting by the fide of a Rivulet, a Horfe ran by, in a full Gallop, which frighten'd them very much, feeing no Body on his Back; they quitted the Place haftily, and as they were in their Way towards the Caftle, their Surprize was much greater, when they perceiv'd two Men lying on the Ground wounded, and cover'd with Blood; fuch a Sight was very frightful to thefe young Ladies, who believing they were dead, durft not approach them, but ran home, and call'd fome of their Servants, with whom they immediately came back, in order to give Affiftance to thefe two Gentlemen, if happily it were not too late.

The Ladies now having fome Attendance with them, came up to thefe unknown Cavaliers, and found that one of them was already dead, and the other still breathing. Leonida, who had hitherto feen all Mankind with Indifferency, feem'd to have fomething more than Compassion for the Missfortune of this Stranger, whom one might judge, by his noble ble Air and Drefs, to be of the first Quality; and as Cafilda appear'd to be equally concern'd, Leonida did not fo much wonder at the Effects it produc'd in her.

Oh! what pity wou'd it be (cry'd Leonida, looking at Cafilda) fhou'd this Stranger die; but what hopes can one have of his Life? It is poffible, he is now expiring. In faying this, the fprinkl'd Water on his Face, and laid his Head on her Knees, whilft Cafilda caus'd a fort of Carriage to be made with the Branches of a Tree; at laft fetching a Sigh, he open'd his Eyes, and perceiving Leonida, made an Effort to fpeak to her; but his Spirits being wafted, he fell into a Swoon, which gave them reafon to believe his Life was in danger.

Leonida and Cafilda (whom I must now call Felicia and Beatricia,) when the Carriage was finish'd, order'd their Servants to lay the Stranger on it, and thus they convey'd him to their House, in great Silence, being perplex'd with fuch a multitude of Thoughts, as wou'd not admit of any Interruption. As foon as they were there, they fent to Carmona for a Surgeon, who after having probed his Wounds, told them they were not Mortal: This agreeable News chang'd the Scene of Sorrow, into that of Joy. Felicia went to his Bed-fide, and by this time he had recover'd his Speech, which he imploy'd in returning Thanks for her Generofity. I can no longer deplore (faid he, in a feeble Voice) the difinal Adventure that had happen'd to me, fince it gives me an Opportunity H 4 portunity of knowing the most deferving Per-fon in the World; but I fear, Madam, my being in your Houfe may incommode you, which extremely lessens the Satisfaction I. fhou'd have to be where you are ; In faying thefe Words, he look'd at her with fo much Admiration and Pleafure, that had the underflood the Language of his Eyes, fhe wou'd have eafily guess'd at the Motions of his Heart. Do not be uneafy, Sir (reply'd fhe) you shall want for no Affiftance, nor have reason to apprehend we fee you here with Difpleafure; you are now in a Condition wherein Silence and Reft are equally neceffary, which Reafon induces me to leave you : with that, fhe retir'd, and left Beatricia behind her; who, as foon as Felicia was gone, approach'd the Bed, and faid to him; Tho' may Sifter hath affured you how defirous we are to be ferviceable to you, yet I must repeat the fame, and conjure you, Sir, to have no other Thought but that of recovering your Health. It will be no cafy matter, Madam, reply'd the Prince, to recover in a Place; where the Objects I fee, may prove more Dangerous to me, than the Wounds I have receiv'd. Beatricia (who did not doubt but these Words were addrefs'd to her) feem'd not to comprehend their meaning; but taking leave of him, went to Felicia's Apartment, and ask'd her what the Stranger had faid to her. She, without diffembling, gave her an Account of their Conversation, which very much pleas'd Beatricia. I must confess, faid she, he express'd himself more oblingly bligingly to me than he did to you : Thefe Words gave fome Uncafinefs to Felicia, without knowing from whence it proceeded.

Beatricia (who was in a different Disposition of Mind) propos'd to her felf, that the only means to banish Don Henriquez from her Heart, was to yield it to another. Whatever Trouble a new Inclination may give me, thought fhe, it never can be equal to the Pain I endure. The Man I love, is now in the Arms of Donna Blanca, and all my hopes on that fide are vanish'd; but in placing my Affection on some other Object it may be kindly return'd. I had Cause enough to apprehend, that Felicia wou'd appear more beautiful than me, in the Eyes of this lovely Stranger, but his Words have convinc'd me of the contrary, and I am refolv'd to be favourable to him, whatever may be the Event: Love is a pleafing Torment.

The Prince of Carency continued ill fome time; and during his Illnefs, receiv'd daily Inftances of the Generofity of thefe Ladies, particularly Felicia's obliging Behaviour to him (on all occafions) made him defirous to express his Gratitude. He began to think his Prefervation was chiefly owing to her tender Care, and by Degrees fell defperately in Love, which threw into the following Reflections : How difficult a Task will it be, to make an Impreffion on that unpractis'd Heart? Her modest Looks, and the Blushes which cover her Cheeks, every time I cast my Eyes on her, evince 106

evince how little she his acquainted with Love ; and dare I flatter my felf with fucceeding in fuch an Attempt ? No, I must not hope' for fo great a Favour from Fortune. I was be-lov'd at Nicopolis by a Perfon I never knew; I no fooner became Captive to the Charms of a Lady at Genoa, but Death fnatch'd the dear Object from me ; and lately as I arriv'd at Villa-Real with a Refolution to marry Leonida, I was inform'd of her Flight and Aversion to me. Alas! my unkind Stars were not fatisfy'd to afflict me with all these Misfortunes. They have sent me a greater one; Leonora's Passion' for me! Her desperate Rage caus'd me to be treated in this barbarous manner; and her Cruelty wou'd still threaten my Days with the greatest Dangers, were she inform'd that I had escap'd, and was now in this Place; but Oh! how can I refolve to leave Felicia, who is already more dear to me, than the Life I wou'd endeavour to preferve? All I can do in this diftreffed State, is to change my Name: I am inclin'd to believe, that as I was taken for the Count of La Vagne at Genoa, I may pass for the same here, where I am not known. If it be my good Fortune to render my Sentiments agreeable to this lovely Charmer, I shall never wilh for a greater Bleffing. I do not doubt but she has an Affection for her Sifter, therefore I must address my felf to her, and obtain Favour, if possible by her means. The Prince us'd often to entertain himself after this manner, betwixt Hope and Fear.

Beatricia

Beatricia one Morning rofe earlier than Felicia, and went to fee the Prince, who was awake, and had refted very ill all Night. Affoon as he faw her enter the Chamber, he thank'd her for fo obliging a Care, and told her, he hop'd fine had repos'd much better than he had done. I must confess, Sir, faid she, I have felt some Uneasiness, which I must lay to your Charge, fince it proceeds from the Curiofity I have to know who you are, and the Uncertainty I am in of being fatisfy'd on that Subject. You judge very unfavourably of my Gratitude, Madam, reply'd the Prince, if you think me capable of not obeying your Com-mands. I am of Genoa, and of the Houfe of Fiefque; my Title is the Count of La Vagne; I have been fome Years in my Travels, and as I was riding thro' the neighbouring Foreft, in my Way to Seville, I was affaulted by Robbers: I did my Endeavour to refift them, but their Number overpower'd me, and left me, Madam, in the Condition you faw me. I know your Family, my Lord, reply'd Beatricia, and cou'd have judg'd in feeing you, that your Extraction was illustrious. The Count of La Vagne (for now I must give that Title to the Prince of Carency) interrupted her, to enquire after Felicia, but with a kind of Impatience, which did not very much please Beatricia, who in a cold manner, made Anfwer, she had not as yet seen her. As she was speaking, the Surgeon came in to the drefs Prince's Wounds, fo flie thought fit to retire. She went directly from thence to Felicia's Apartment, who was iuft just rising. What, faid she to Beatricia, drefs'd already! How comes it, Sifter, you are up fo early ! I can give you no other Reafon, reply'd fhe, only I was asham'd to lic a Bed fo fine a Morning: But will you believe I have been to visit the Stranger, and that I know his Name and Country. You may as well fay, interrupted Felicica, that you know also the Secrets of his Heart. No, reply'd Beatricia fmiling, I am very fincere, and can affure you; our Conversation ended with his acquainting me, that he is of Genoa, and is call'd the Count of La Vagne. As you are to vifit him next, perhaps you may learn fomething more. I have not fo much Curiofity as you imagine, reply'd Felicia, and I fancy I shall trouble him but very little with my Prefence. Accordingly. she did not go into the Prince's Chamber till late in the Evening, being then inform'd, he was very ill; for his Uncafinefs at not feeing her all that Day, and the Pain occasion'd by his Wounds, had thrown him into a violent Fever. As foon as the approach'd his Bed, he look'd at her with much Tendernefs, and faid, I flatter'd my felf more than I ought to have done, Madam, in thinking the Condition I am in, had mov'd your Pity, fince I find at prefent, nothing touch'd you but the fad Afpect of a dying Man, pierc'd with Wounds, and lying in a Sea of Blood. You abandon me, charming Felicia, and take no Care to preferve the Life of an unhappy Wretch, who is indebted to you alone, for the fmall Share 25% Off The state of the state the 51.

he has left of it. I would not incommode you with a Vifit, my Lord, reply'd' Felicia, my Sifter having told me this Morning, that in the State you are in, nothing was more necessary than Repofe. No, no, Madam, (faid he, interrupting her) you have not thought on me. Donna Beatricia did not hinder you from coming to fee me; your Eyes convince me of the Truth and you only with my Recovery, to banish me your Prefence for ever. He faid this with an Air fo moving, that fhe cou'd not help fhowing in her Looks more Affection; than Indifferency.: You have been here fo little a while, reply'd fhe, that I hardly have had time to confult my Inclinations, yet give me leave to affure you, that I find nothing in them to your. Prejudice; and fhou'd very much regret my having known you, if I thought in leaving this Place, you wou'd entirely forget me. She exprefs'd thefe last Words blushing, and with some Fear, which charm'd the Prince, who was going to make his Retributions, when Beatricia enter'd the Chamber, in fome Diforder : One of my Women, my Lord, faid she, who is just return'd from walking in the Foreft, found this: Picture in the fame Place where we first faw you. I suppose it is yours, and the Person it represents, is too charming, not to merit all your Affection. The Prince told her, it was true, the Picture had been recommended to his Care, and receiv'd it with a deep Sigh. It was that which Olympia Doria had prefented to him. This gave much Uneafiness to Felicia, cia, who cou'd not help defiring to fee it, but had hardly turn'd her Eyes on it, when her Mind was fill'd with Trouble ; which to conceal, fhe retired to her Clofet, where being a-lone: I thought, faid fhe, I had only Cafilda to fear; but alas! my Fate is much more fe-vere; for certainly the Perfon he loves is the most beautiful Creature in the World, and his Paffion is return'd, fince fhe has given him her Picture. If he shou'd cease to love her on my Account, it would be a Perfidiousness that might give me room to fear in my turn a re-fembling Deftiny; and if he is conftant to her, what can I hope? She yielded her felf up to thefe fad Reflections, and leaving them for others more tormenting : Oh ! continued fhd, cou'd any thing be more fatal than this laft Adventure ? I flew from the Prince of Carency, becaufe my Parents wou'd have me marry contrary to my Inclination. I thought my felf fafe in this Forest, where I only apprehended to meet with wild Beafts ; but thefe fierce Animals have done me no harm : It is a Stranger, a dying Man, that has deprived me of my Peace, and made me acquainted with Sentiments, I thought Leonida's Heart incapable of receiving. A shower of Tears attended these Words, and fhe refolv'd never more to fee this dangerous Cavalier; for which reafon fhe feign'd an Indifposition, and confin'd her felf to her Bed; but cou'd not help enquiring after the Count, who was now extremely ill. His Fever was very much increas'd by his not feeing Felicia, and

and his anxious Reflections fo tormented him, that he thought of nothing but Death.

He was in evident danger, when Beatricia enter'd Felicia's Chamber all in Tears. There are no hopes left Sifter, cry'd fhe; the unhappy Count is dying. If you have a mind to fee him before he expires, you have no time to lofe. Felicia was not prepar'd for this difagreeable News, which had like to have thrown her into a Swoon; but being a little recover'd; fhe repented the obftinate Refolution fhe had made, to fee him no more. She thought now, fhe was going to lofe him for ever, and that fuch a Lofs wou'd make her the most unfortunate Perfon in the World. Ye Powers above (cry'd fhe going towards his Apartment) give me the Count of La Vagne, were he never to love me, shou'd he even hate me, let him live.

She ran into his Chamber whilft he was in a fainting Fit; his Eyes were fhut, and he had neither Voice nor Pulfe. She approach'd him, trembling, and raifing his Head, laid it on her Bofom, bathed his Face with Tears, and at that Inftant was more to be deplor'd than him fhe lamented. At laft he fetch'd a deep Sigh, and opening his Eyes, was transported to find his dear Felicia near him, and fo touch'd at his Illnefs: He look'd languishing at her, and making an Effort to speak; Ah! divine Felicia, faid he, is it you that gives me Affiftance, and are you come to fave me from Death? You need no longer fear, for a Life

I cannot lofe, fince its Prefervation is become your Concern. My Lord, reply'd fhe, (low enough to be heard only by him) believe me, fence, fo they cou'd not purfue their Discourse : But these few Words produc'd fuch wonderful Effects in the Count, that he daily recover'd. "How much were thefe Lovers to be pitied, not knowing each other? Chance had con-triv'd to make them meet, yet it was their un-happy Deftiny, not to enjoy a Bleffing for which they wou'd have facrific'd every Thing. Such is the Misfortune of fome Perfons, who purchase the most innocent Pleasures at the Expence of a thoufand Torments. Felicia, accompany'd by her Sister, went often to see the Count, who observ'd the Care she took, never to be alone with him; but he could not defire Beatricia to give him an Opportunity of entertaining Felicia; for tho' of all Mankind he had the leaft Vanity, yet he perceiv'd by her Looks and Expressions, that she had some favourable Thoughts of him, and confequent-ly an improper Perfon for a Confidant. But one Evening, hearing fhe was gone into the Foreft without her Sifter, he caus'd himfelf to be drefs'd; and tho' he had hardly Strength enough to walk, yet went to Felicia's Apartment.

She

She cou'd not help being very much furprized, when the faw the Count, who fell at her Feet without having power to fpeak one Word. He took her Hand and kifs'd it with fuch Transports, as express'd the Motions of his Soul. Felicia's diforder was not inferior to his. They looked at one another, as if they had met after a long Absence; at last the Count broke Silence : You have infpired me, Madam, faid he, with a Paffion fo transcendent, that you must needs have perceived it in all my Actions, and I must confess, I thought you took fome Pity on me, but I have too much Caufe to believe the contrary, fince your Looks exprefs the utmost Indifference. Oh! judge how uneafy I am at this cruel Uncertainty. I now come to know my Fate, and conjure you, adorable Felicia, to tell me what I must expect. My Love is fuch, that nothing can ever make it change, and were I Sovereign of the Universe, I would lay it at your Feet: Here he was filent, and Felicia reply'd with as much Grace, as Modesty; My Concern was fo great whilft you were speaking, my Lord, that I did not confider you were on your Knees. I beg you will rife if you are defirous I should fay any thing to you. He obey'd her, Com-mands, but fear'd to cast his Eyes on her, being like a Man, who expected to hear the Sentence of his Death. We are both in a diforder, faid she, which we might have avoided, had you not spoke to me of your Passion. I must confess, my Lord, to my Shame, that the T 25.

the fame Inclination which engag'd you to entertain me, has prevailed with me to hear you. What more can I fay of my Weakness (continued fie blufhing?) I difcovered part of your Sentiments, and endeavoured in vain to con-ceal mine." I had never lov'd any thing before, and my Stars have decreed you should become agreeable to me? yet do not think to take any Advantage from fo lincere a Confession, fince I declare my Mind this time, with a Refolution never to fpeak to you more; but without having a defire to penetrate into the Caufe, I cannot help telling you the Fear I am in, of being made a Sacrifice to another, whom, perhaps, you might love better than me. Oh Madam! cry'd the Count, (in a Rapture) judge better of a Man whom you have just loaded with your Favours, and do not fufpect Ingratitude from a Heart, that bears your Image; be affured, a Perfon who fighs for you, can never think of any other Object. What have not I to fear, reply'd fhe, from the Lady, whose Picture you so much effeem. That shall never give you the leaft trouble, faid the amorous Count, (prefenting it to her) here it is; keep it as an Evincement of my Fidelity. Felicia was touched at fo great a Proof of his Paffion, and express'd much Satisfaction in receiving it, then defired him to tetire, apprehending, that his being up fo long, might do him a Prejudice, and whatever Violence he did his Inclinations, he could not refute obeying 133 As

As foon as he was gone, fhe reflected on all that had pais'd. What! Leonida, faid fhe, are you not content with hearing a Declaration, which you ought to have declin'd, but alfo have owned to a Stranger that you could love him? You, who are engag'd to the Prince of Carency, can you be fo eafily captivated, and weak enough to confers your Affection for another ? You have already flown your Jealoufy, which is a certain Proof of a violent Paffion; what Judgment will the Count form from fuch a Behaviour? You are going to lofe his Heart, and become a difgrace to your Sex. Oh un-fortunate Creature! what muft you do to at-tone for a Fault, which feems of fo high a Na-ture? These Thoughts gave her the deepest Concern, and her Face was bathed with Tears when Beatricia returned; but she took fo much Care to hide them, that they were not perceiv'd.

The Count being retired to his Chamber, pafs'd his time the moft agreeably in the World, when he call'd to mind Felicia's Generofity, but could hardly flatter himfelf with the Succefs he wish'd for. Oh Love! faid he, will you at last change my Pain into Pleasure, and repair the Ills you have done me? Amiable Felicia has heard me, and protested I was not indifferent to her. Heavens! let us be for ever united, that our good or ill Fortune may equally affect us. Day began to appear before he could close his Eyes; he rose, and went to see Felicia, who was alone in her Closet, re-I 2 flecting 116

flecting on that, which had rack'd her Imagi-nation all Night: She received the Count with much Civility, but appear'd fo melancholly, that he knew not what to think of fo great an Alteration. What is my Crime, Madam, faid he ? Have I done any think to incur your difpleafure? You feem unwilling to turn your Eyes on me. Are you concerned for having given me Room to think myfelf the happieft of Men, and do you already regret the obliging Terms, you imploy'd Yefterday to banish my Alarms ? Alafs! continued he, are you refolv'd to cast me at once into Despair by so cruel a Change? No, my Lord, reply'd fhe (looking at-him with an Air, that might convince him of the contrary) I have us'd ineffectual Means to conquer those Sentiments I discover'd to you. I wish I could see you with Indifference; but I find it is not in my Power; do not then be uneafy; I alone ought to be fo. The Count transported with Love and Gratitude took Felicia's Hand, and kifs'd it with all the Marks of Passion and Respect, that could be express'd on such an Occasion. Beatricia, being infor-med they were together, entered suddenly the Chamber they were in, and surprized them, just as the Count was killing Felicia's Hand. How strangely was she amaz'd at feeing this. She chang'd Colour feveral times, and her Eyes were animated with an uncommon Fire, which they immediately perceiv'd, tho' fhe endeavoured to conceal her disorder. il iloia Linco an

Their Conversation turn'd on a general Subject, and from that Hour, the us'd all possible Means to prevent their entertaining one ano-ther in private: These Proceedings extremely perplex'd the Count. Divine Feiicia, faid he to her one Day) pity my Sufferings, and con-fider how fevere a Law I am forc'd to impofe on myfelf, when T filence a Paffion, which I have had the good Fortune to render agree-able to You. What Authority has your Sifter to lay fo cruel a Reftraint on you? I fee her Uneafinefs, my Lord, reply'd Felicia, and to fhow the Confidence I have in you, I will own to you, fhe is not my Sifter, nor even related to me; I would have let you fooner into the Secret, had I found a favourable Opportunity. Oh Madam ! How obilging is this Declaration, reply'd the Count, and what Reproaches do I owe myfelf, for not having acquainted you with the Circumstances of my Life? The Hours I pass'd in your Company were fo transient; that I chose to imploy them in confeffing the Power of your Charms. We both of us have err'd, my Lord, reply'd Felicia, in neglecting to inform each other of fome particulars, which are essential to our future Felicutars, which are effential to our future Feli-city; yet if I may judge of your Heart by my own, it had no fhare in this Omiflion, and I promife to give you a faithful Relation of all that has pais'd from my Infancy: You will then find it is not without Caufe, that I figh fometimes, and complain of the Rigour of my Fate; but you must prepare your felf to over-I 2

come a great many Difficulties, if you per-fevere in your Love for the unhappy Felicia. Oh Madam! reply'd he, no Difficulties can e-ver alarm me; I have Love and Courage to affift me, and if you espouse my Interest, all Things will be eafy to me: But, faid the, fup-I hings will be eally to me: But, laid the, tup-pofe I were contracted to another, what would you do? At these Words, the Count changed Colour. What do you tell me, Madam, cry'd he, contracted! Oh Heavens! To what Mis-fortunes am I doom'd? Do not afflict your felf, my Lord, reply'd she, I am yet Mistrefs of my Deftiny; can you think I would receive your Addresses, if I had an Inclination for a-ny other? No, such a Proceeding would ren ny other? No, fuch a Proceeding would render my Heart unworthy of you. These Affu-rances gave some Ease to the Count's Mind, who was just going to express his Satisfaction to his charming Mistress, when Beatricia came and troubled them with her Prefence.

Her Jealoufy was now increafed to fuch a degree, that the was even diftracted, when the faw them fpeaking to one another, and affoon as the was alone, the abandon'd hertelf to the most violent Despair. I am not belov'd, faid the, and I flatter'd myself, that I had infpired the Count with fuch Sentiments as would have been agreeable to me, but he is entirely devoted to Felicia. He adores her, and the triumphs over my Weaknets. What do I fay, continued the ? (after having reflected fome time) perhaps if he were acquainted with the Motions of my Soul, he would act another another Part, Ah! why did I not declare my Thoughts to him, and why should I accufe him of being the Caufe of my Torment, fince he does not know the Indifpolition I am. in ? I must either inform him of what I feel, or refolve to fee him constant in his Passion for my Rivalinsourd Mary 21 VELON Li

This unexpected Meffage gave him fome Uncafinefs, notwithfanding he obey'd her Orders, and as foon as fhe faw him, her Mind almost chang'd in relation to the Subject, that induced her to fend for him. He ask'd her obligingly what were her Commands, to which the answered in thefe Terms; your health, My Lord, is fo perfectly recovered, that I fear we shall lofe you foon ; and as I have fome reafon to be convinced our Company is not indifferent to you, I take this occasion to affure you, how pleas'd we should be to fee you remain here ; yet I cannot help faying, I have endeavoured in vain to difcover, whether my Sifter or I have the Precedency in you Affections; perhaps this Queftion may flow my Indifcretion, but I believe you a Man of too much Honour, to leave me in an Uncertainty; therefore let your Inclinations determine in favour of either of us; I will do you all the Service in my Power, and if you make me your Confidant, it shall no ways lessen my Friendship for I 4 you, you. The Count (who was above as ny diffimulation express'd much Pleafure at the Opportunity the gave him, to de-clare his Sentiments. Nothing can be more generous than your Proceeding, Madam, faid he, and I should be unworthy of your Goodnefs, if I did not repay it with Sincerity. I am in Love, it is true, and you would have been the Object of it, had I not feared my Pallion might offend you : Young Felicia has captivated my Heart, and I conjure you to favour me in my attempt on hers; I shall in return, show my Esteem and Gratitude to you for so considerable a Service. Beatricia, at these Words, was Thunderstruck; and would have fallen down at his Feet, were it not for a Tree that flood by, which supported her; the made a vain Effort to conceal her Grief; her Colour chang'd, and the Tears which ran from her Eyes, difcovered part of her Sufferings to the Count who faid many obliging Things to her by way of Confolation, and protefted, he would for ever do his best Endeavours to ferve her; but all he could fay was not capable of giving her Satisfaction; Love requires Love, and it is, an offence of the highest degree to offer any other thing in Return. Do and and

About this time Don Fernand Benavidez (who was innocent of the Crime, laid to his Charge, having no more Leonora' for his Enemy) began, after the Death of this Favourite, to be heard in his Justification; he wrote the particulars to Cafilda, and withal, that he was in hopes of being foon fet at Liberty after which he would immediately go to fee Leonida. This the kept fecret till the had penetrated into the Sentiments of the Count; but when the found all her hopes were deftroy'd, the thought of nothing but tormenting these happy Lovers in their Amour. What! faid the; shall I fuffer this ungrateful Man to be blefs'd with the fight of my Rival, and omit acquainting my Brother with an adventure, wherein he is to much concern'd? He doats on Leonida whilft the loves the Count of La Vagne, and is equally belovidno My Brother and I, without doubt, muft be the Victims of their Paffion, and he will load me with eternal Reproaches, for havingradmitted fordangerous a Stranger into his Houfe ; I must facrifice him to my Red venge, for what can I expect from his Cruel ty? My Sighs and Tears, had no Power to move his Pity, and fince nothing can prevail with him, I will punish his Barbarity. I have but this Remedy left, and cannot flatter my defpairing Soul with any other relief. Having tormented her felforwith these confused Thoughts, she wrote a Letter to her Brother, wherein she gave him the Particulars relating to what the knew of the Count of La Vagne; telling him at the fame Time, that he had conceiv'd a Passion for Leonida, who return'd it with Sentiments for of bliging, that she believ'd it wou'd be impossible to difengage them, unlefs he took very fecret Mcasures. Benavidez was strangely affected with ER 1 this this News, which he receiv'd the Day the Queen had order'd his Liberty. What ! (faid he to the Gentleman, who had accompany'd the young Ladies to his Gaftle) have I depriv'd the Princer of Carency of the Possession of this excellent? Creature, to yield her to the Count of La Vagne : I thought I had conceal'd her in a Place fo retir'd, that fhe wou'd have efcap'd the most penetrating Spy; yet the Cruelty of my Fortune has fo contriv'd it, that the thou'd find in that folizary Forest, one of the handfomeft Men in the World expiring, and prevent his Fate by making his Prefervation her Care, which I fear has rob'd me of Leonida's Heart : My Confinement cost the Prince his Life, whole Generofity engag'd him to make his Addresses to Leanora with the only View of procuring my Liberty. By what Fatality, continued he, does the Count of La Vagne live? Is not he the fame whole Death Olympia Dorian formuch deplor'd, that her Grief terminated her Days ? Has he fo little Gratitude, after! loving a Mistress who died for him, to make a fecond Choice? Her Impression ought to have been everlafting, but I will punish his Inconstancy to her, and his new Passion for Leonida, who has made me already commit too many Crimes to leave my Felicity imperfect : I must give some Ease to my bleeding Heart, by depriving this too happy Rival of his Life. These violent Reflections were follow'd by many others, for he thought that if he kept Leonida longer at his Houfe, as Chance had had made her acquainted with the Count of La Vagne, a like Acrident might expose her to the fight of fome Perfons, who knew her, and wou'd inform Don John of her Re-Love and Jealoufy wou'd not permit him to flay any Time at Villa Real; he had no fooner feen the Queen, and return'd her Thanks for his Liberty, but went privately to Porto Real, in order to dispose every. Thing for the carrying off of Leonida to Morocco, where he was fure to be in high Efferm, having feveral Relations of great Diffinction in Bar-

He there made an Agreement with a Captain of a Ship, then went to his Country Seat; but ftop'd first in the Forest, and sent for his Steward, to whom he gave a Letter to Cafilda, with Orders to deliver it into her own Hands : he was not long expecting an Anfwer, for he faw her coming with the Man he had fent. Benavidez went up to her, and after having embrac'd her tenderly, fought for the most conceal'd Place to entertain here And here they took Refolutions fo contrary to the Felicity of the Count and Leonida, that it had like to have depriv'd them of their Lives. Oh ! how far were they from forefeeing their Misfortune? fince at this Time they were making Protestations of eternal Love, and little thought that Benavidez and his Sifter were proposing Means to disappoint them.

definit ever to marke Choice of provident Cafilda

Cafilda told her Brother fhe had fufficient Reafon to be convinc'd, that the Count's Addreffes to Leonida were favourably receiv'd. I will crofs their Paffion (interrupted Benavidez, with a furious Air) I am refolv'd to feize on Leonida, and carry her to Morocco; you fhall go with us, but before we part, I must facti-fice the prefumptuous Count of La Vagne to my Refentment. What, Brother ! cry'd fhe, (almost distracted) will your not be content to posses your Mistres, without my going with you to a Place for which I have so great an Aversion. I do not intend to do any Violence to your Inclinations, said he, in making you this Proposal; but I suppose the same Motive which invited you to abandon the Count and enter into this Retirement, may engage you to go elfewhere; neverthelefs, Sifter, you are under no Conftraint: The only thing I defire you will do for my Satisfaction, is to contrive a Way for me to be hidden this Night in the Count's Chamber, that I may have the Plca-fure of striking a Heart that dares adore Leo-nida. Suspend your Design, Barbarian, (inter-rupted Casilda in her first Transports) I am as little able to hear you as fecond your Cruelty; the Count's Life shall not be in your Power till your have taken away mine." What do you fay, Sifler, (cry'd Benavidez, extreme-ly furpriz'd?) I can hardly believe what I hear. Is it pollible, that you love this Stranger; and have already forgot Hinriquez? Are you destin'd ever to make Choice of ungrateful Men :

Men; remember how your first Lover treated you, and what you are to expect from this? Do you imagine, that after having a Passion for Leonida, and being belov'd by her, he can change his Mind in favour of you? This is very difobliging, reply'd Cafilda, but I hope every thing, and flatter my felf with his Love, if he fees her no more. Seize on her, fly with her and leave me here with him. Will it be confiftent with your Honour to ftay alone with the Count, faid he? What will the Count think of it, if once it is known at Villa Real ? They will think nothing to my Prejudice, reply'd she; the Count must be mine, or I retire into a Monastry, fo that I shall have but little Reason to be concern'd at the World's Opinion, whether good or ill Fortune attends me. Do you confider, Sifter, faid Benavidez, that your Affection for my Rival, may put him hereafter in a Condition to dispute Leonida with me ? I wou'd have fhown his Corp's to her defac'd with Wounds, and her hopes being destroy'd by his Death, she wou'd cafily confent to make me happy. What an Error it is, reply'd Cafilda, to fuppofe that fo horrid a Scene cou'd introduce you into her Favour; fhe wou'd ever reproach you of the greatest Cruelty; yet if you believe his Death will ferve your Defigns, fay you have kill'd him, tho' its uncommon to boast of such a Fact, were it even true.

Benavidez perceiving his Sifter lov'd the Count too paffionately to confent to fo cruel an an Action, in Compliance to her, as well as out of fear of her making any Difcovery, wou'd no longer infift upon it. To fhow my Affection for you, dear Cafilda, faid he, I fubmit to your Pleafure, only oblige me in being fecret. He had brought with him three Men devoted to his Interest, who he was fure cou'd carry off Leonida, without being difcover'd; therefore having taken effectual Meafures with Cafilda, the Defign was foon executed to his Satisfaction.

That Evening his Sifter invited Leonida to take a Turn in the Park, and by degrees led her into an Alley, which convey'd them to-wards the Foreft; till at laft, Night coming on, and Leonida hearing a Noife, was going to retire when the was feiz'd by Benavidez and his Men : In fairs of the Fricht for his Men : In spite of the Fright she was in, she endeavour'd to disengage her felf from them, and having fufficient room to believe it was a Plot against her, she cry'd out, repeat-ing several Times the Count of La Vagne's Name, and call'd him to her Succour; but alas, he did not fuspect his Felicia was in danger, who was carry'd off, and gone a great way before he heard of her, or his own Miffortune. Cafilda took care the Count shou'd know nothing that Night of what had pass'd, to prevent his purfuing her Brother; but fent to him the next Morning, and defir'd he wou'd come into her Apartment, having an Affair of Confequence to communicate to him. As foon as he enter'd her Chamber, she affected to be melan-melancholy ; There is no Friendship, faid she, but Love can diffolve: You were Witnefs, my Lord, of that between Felicia and Me : She is not my Sister, I must confess, yet I never cou'd have imagin'd she wou'd abandon me in fuch a manner. Read this Letter which the left on her Toilet; it was just now deliver'd to me; you will find it equally regards us. The Count in taking it, express'd as much Uneafinefs, as if he had known it to be a Meffenger of ill News; it was written in these Terms. out 'reing able to unre and Wonde at lait,

THE Affection you have for your Brother, and your Fears of exposing him to any Danger, were the Motives that hinder'd me from acquainting you sooner, with his and my Design. Iou certainly wou'd have opposed it, had you known I am going away with him this Night. I could wift, Sifter, your Love for me wou'd invite you to come to us at Jaën; you may affure your felf, I shou'd be over-joy'd to see you, and hear, that your Sentiments for the Count of La Vagne, have met with a kind Return. I leave him with yoa, fo hope you will have no Canfe bereafter to complain of his Indifference. As I have a particular Esteem for him, I defire you will inform him of what you know concerning my Affairs, that he may be convincid, it is no more in my Power to dispose of my Heart; and remember, my dear Cafilda, that if I made my Resolution a Secret, you ought to forgive me, fince Faults of Love deferve rather Pity, than Anger.

This

This fatal Letter threw the Count into fuch an Agony, that he was like a Man who felt the Tortures of an approaching Death ; he turn'd pale, and all his Senfes abandon'd him. Cafilda (who was prepar'd for this difinal Scene) took care that speedy Affistance shou'd be given him, and by the Help and Force of Remedies, he foon came to himfelf; he open'd his Eyes, and feeing feveral Perfons about him, made Signs to them to withdraw; which they obey'd, and left Cafilda with him in the Chamber : He look'd at her fome time, without being able to utter one Word; at laft, having recover'd his Speech, he faid in a feeble Accent; It was unkind in you, Madam, to acquaint me with the greatest Misfortune that cou'd ever happen to me. No, my Lord, interrupted Cafilda, I do not deserve a Reproach; it is but reasonable you shou'd be inform'd of Felicia's Sentiments; after what fhe has done for Benavidez. Who is this you name, the Prince fuddenly reply'd : I name Don Fernand Benavidez my Brother, faid she, and the Lady who went here by the Name of Felicia of Leon, is Leonida of Velasco; her Father had contracted her to the Prince of Carency, who is highly diftinguish'd by his eminent Birth and perfonal Merit; but having conceiv'd a tender Affection for my Brother, she preferr'd this Retirement to the Court, and wou'd not wait the unwelcome Arrival of a Perfon to whom her Father had destin'd her. We came away together from Villa Real, and ever fince, the has 2 1 5 has continued a mutual Correspondence with my Brother; her going away with him last Night, is an Evincement of this Truth. The Prince, at these Words, broke out into so pasfionate a Grief, that it wou'd have mov'd the most inhuman Heart with Pity. O cruel Fortune! cry'd he, will you never ceafe to perfecute me? Was it then Leonida I faw, and to whose potent Charms I yielded, only to make me more wretched, through her Inconstancy ? The ungrateful Fair betrays and flies me; and that dear Friend too, that fame Benavidez for whom I facrific'd my felf, he is the Man who has impos'd on my Credulity; he is in Love with the Woman to whom I am promis'd, and the Traitor describ'd her to me as a Monster, to make me conceive an Aversion for her. Is this all the Reward I must expect, after having ador'd Leonida, and fo entirely lov'd Benavidez? Cafilda was in the greatest Astonishment imaginable, to liear the Prince express himself in these Terms. She easily understood by his Discourse, that he was the fame Prince of the House of Bourbon, whom the Count of La March his Father had contracted to Leonida 2 but her Surprize was the greater, becaufe the thought the Prince, not finding Leonida at Villa Real, was return'd to France; and as the knew nothing of his Adventure with Leonora, fhe cou'd not well conceive, by what Accident he had been attack'd in the Forest, and why he had chang'd his Name: These different Circumftances wholly employ'd her Thoughts. The K

The Prince, on the other fide, cou'd not moderate his Grief; he was like a Perfon depriv'd of his Senfes; what with Sighs, Tears and Menaces, no Man ever appear'd in a more deplorable Condition.

What need you, my Lord, faid she, express fo much Concern for Leonida ? She never lov'd you : you fee fhe has prefer'd Benavidez, and forgets even the Rules of Modesty, to follow her Lover: Why then will you fuffer fo much for an ungrateful Woman, who merits not your Confideration? Oh, Madam! cry'd the Prince, I know not what I do; my Despair is so great, that I am no longer Master of my Reason; my Misfortunes are not to be comprehended; I find my felf betray'd by a Perfon, who was contracted to me from her Infancy, and by a Friend to whom I had confided the Secrets of my Soul. Leonida, who feem'd to approve my Paffion, has deceiv'd me, and added Contempt to her Ingratitude; fhe knew I ador'd her, yet the perfidious Fair receiv'd my Vows, only to facrifice them to another. Just Heaven! revenge me of this perjur'd Beauty : But what do I fay, continued he, a Moment after ? I have not Refolution enough to wilh her the Punishment she deserves : She is dear to me in fpite of all, and I will do my utmost Endeavours to regain her. Oh ! I love her, and love her to Distraction. The Force of my Refentment must fall on the Traitor Benavidez; his Blood shall attone for the Affront I have receiv'd. You might do what you fay, my Lord.

Lord, interrupted Cafilda, if Leonida lov'd him less; but you have sufficient Cause to believe by the Letter she left, and his Flight, that she is now marry'd to him; They are gone together to Jaën; Don Alonzo, who is Governor of that Town, and my Brother's Uncle, approves his Paffion for her, and will protect him; Believe me then, the Defign you form is impracticable. Do you think Benavidez wou'd have made fuch a Step, without taking all neceffary Measures for it? Don John of Velasco is one of the greatest Men in Spain, and my Brother knowing his Power, has carry'd her to a Place where he defies his Enemies. His Precautions (interrupted the Prince) will be ineffectual against me; I neither fear Danger nor Death, and if I revenge my Wrongs, I shall die with Content.

Live, my Lord, (reply'd Cafilda blufhing) Oh! live for me, fince my Passion for you is transcendent. Think with what Pleafure I receiv'd you into this House; and tho' your Retributions were no Ways equal to the Greatnefs of the Favour, yet nothing cou'd prevent the Fatality of my Deftiny, which not only forces me to love you, but even deprives me of my Peace and Liberty. Ah, my Lord! can Sentiments fo tender make no Impression ? My Fortune is great, and my Family one of the first in Castile; then let our Hearts be so united as we may be for ever happy. I will leave my Friends and Relations to follow you to the utmost Bounds of the World. While K 2 Cafilda Cafilda was thus declaring her Mind to the Prince, and flattering her felf with Succefs, he walked diftractedly up and down the Chamber with his Arms crofs'd, taking fo little notice of her Difcourfe, that he neither look'd at her, nor made any Anfwer; but like a Man in a violent Paffion, was leaving the Apartment, without knowing what he did, or where to direct his Courfe.

Cafilda (who cou'd not bear the Thoughts of losing the Prince) had no longer Reason in her Words or Actions, but ran and ftop'd him, with her Face drown'd in Tears. Will you go, Barbarian, faid she? What! will you fly me, and abandon a Woman that adores you, to follow perfidious Leonida ? Leave her with my Brother; defpife her, and to compleat your Revenge, even forget her, fince by her Behaviour the has render'd her felf unworthy of your Love. My Quality is equal to hers, and what I have fuperior to her, is my Conftancy : But what do I fee? Oh Heavens! cry'd fhe. (looking at him) with what Ingratitude am I rewarded? You leave me to expose your felf to the greatest Dangers: you ------She was going to continue her Discourse, when the Prince interrupted her. What wou'd you have me do, Madam, faid he? Can I love any thing but Leonida? and were I capable of a Change, cou'd it be in Fayour of the Sifter of Benavidez ? Ah ! do you deprive me even of Hope, which is not deny'd the most Unfortunate? (reply'd fhe, fhedding a Shower of Tears. Same)

Tears, where Fury had no lefs a Share than Love;) but inhuman as you are, don't think to live in Peace with your Cruelty; I will find means to torment you, and make you repent the little Regard you have to my Sutferings.

The Prince did not ftay to make any Anfwer to Cafilda, whom he left in her Chamber, without either Strength to follow him, or Power to fpeak a Word; but was meditating on feveral violent Defigns, being divided between Love, Jealoufy, and Defpair.

After this Scene, it is not to be imagin'd the Prince wou'd remain in Benavidez's Houfe. He refolv'd immediately to go to Carmona, where he thought he might hear fomething concerning Leonida; and as that Town was in his way to Jaën (which was the Place mention'd in her Letter to Cafilda) he was in hopes, by a strict Enquiry, to discover the Road Benavidez had taken. With this Defign he fet out, but cou'd not help complaining of the Adversity of his Fortune. Can I ever flatter my felf, faid he, with the Poffession of a Heart, that has fo inhumanly betray'd me ? What Motive cou'd induce Leonida to act in fo deceitful a manner? Was it only to facrifice me to Benavidez ? No, I cannot harbour fuch injurious Thoughts of one, who appear'd fo modeft and virtuous. Then calling to mind, that fhe had told him she was engag'd; Why, cruel Creature, (faid he, as if he were speaking to her) why did not you entirely confide in me? K 3 You

You are engag'd it's true, fince I am the Man to whom you are contracted. We fhou'd have known each other, and perhaps you might have lov'd me; but inftead of acting fincerely, you have carry'd your Perfidioufnets to an Extremity. You liften'd to my transcendent Paffion, and flatter'd me with a Return only to make my Defpair proportionable.

Had his Diffraction been of a more moderate Nature, it is probable he wou'd have apprehended farther Confequences from the Fury and Refentment of Leonora, (for as yet he was not inform'd of her Death;) befides, he had no mind to go to Seville, for fear of feeing the Count of La March, his Brother, to whom he wou'd be oblig'd to relate his Adventure with Leonida, and the Error fhe had been guilty of, which he cou'd not refolve, being of a generous Temper, and incapable of faying any thing to the Prejudice of a Lady he lov'd fo entirely.

These Obstacles at another Time wou'd have embarafs'd the Prince, but in this Conjuncture, they did not in the least affect him, for his Thoughts were wholly imploy'd on the Measures he shou'd take to recover his dear Leonida. He arriv'd at Carmona, and tho' in a Spanisconfe Drefs, was prefently known to be a Foreigner by the Fairness of his Complexion, and Colour of his Hair; he carry'd in his Countenance such Marks of Melancholy, that no Body cou'd see him without Concern. The Governour of that Place was foon acquainted with with his Arrival; and as he had receiv'd Orders from Court, not to let any Stranger pafs that Way, without Examination, hearing he was a Perfon of Quality and a Foreigner, out of a Compliment he paid a Vifit to the Prince, who receiv'd him with fo much Politeness and Grandeur, that after a short Conversation and many Offers of Service, the Governour invited him to accept of an Apartment in the Caftle.

The Prince return'd his Civility in a most obliging manner, and defired to be excus'd, because his Affairs wou'd not permit him to ftay above one Night at Carmona; but the o-ther, unwilling to be deny'd, repeated his Im-portunities, and with much Difficulty, perfuaded him to comply with his Requeft.

A noble Entertainment was prepar'd in the Castle for the Prince, who cou'd not suppress his violent Chagrin; which the Governour per-ceiv'd, but wou'd not enquire into the Caufe, He underftood by his Difcourfe, that his De-fign was to go to faën, and as he had a Son, who commanded a Company in the Citadel of that Place, and whofe Name was Don Gabriel d'Agular, he told the Prince very obligingly, that if he approv'd of it, he wou'd write to him, in order to acquaint him with his Arrival there; and added, that if it were in his Son's power to ferve him, he was fatisfy'd he wou'd neglect no Opportunity of expressing his Readiness.

This free and gallant Behaviour of the Governour, engag'd the Prince to accept his Offer for with the fameFreedom. He knew no Body at $\mathcal{J}_{a\ddot{e}n}$; and as he wanted the Affiftance of fome Perfon in whom he cou'd confide, to enter privately the Citadel, where he thought Benavoidez and Leonida were retired, he the more willingly embrac'd fo favourable an Oc-cafion. The next Day having made his Acknowledgments to the Governour for his extraordinary Favours, he took Leave of him, and left Carmona, but not without acquainting Don John of Velasco with what had pass'd, that he might act on his fide for the Recove-ry of Leonida. Never was Surprize greater, than that which his Letters caus'd at Court; for Don John and his Lady were perfuaded the Prince had been kill'd by Leonora's Affaffins. One may imagine how great was their Joy, when they heard Heaven had preferv'd him, yet it cou'd no ways alleviate their inexpressible Grief for the Lofs of their Daughter. They immediately thought of means toget her away from $\mathcal{F}_{a\ddot{e}n}$, where they believ'd the was; but whilft the Prince is on his Journey thither, let us sce what becomes of unfortunate Leonida.

As foon as Don Fernand Benavidez had brought her out of the Park, he fat her on Horfeback before him, and held her with fuch Force, that all the Efforts fhe made to difen-gage herfelf, were in vain. She cry'd out, and implor'd Heaven and Earth for Succour. She call'd the Count of La Vagne to her Affistance, but her Cries and Tears had no Power. He led led her through uncommon Ways, over Mountains and Rocks, where the Ecchoes anfwering her Complaints, rather augmented her Sorrow, than leffen'd it.

Whoever you be, faid fhe to Benavidez, you are the most unjust of Mortals, to use this Violence with me. I never gave any One Cause to treat me after so cruel a manner. Why will you take Pleafure in diflurbing the Peace of my Life? By what Authority do you act thus ? If my Father has fent you, I am, difpos'd to obey his Orders, without being under the Necessity of travelling all Night with a Troop of Men, as if I were a Criminal. Oh! let us stop (continued she, seeing he made no Answer) I conjure you, carry me back to the Place where you found me ; you need not apprehend my Escape, fince I am alone there with a young Lady, whole Brother is now Prifoner at Villa Real, and were he at Home, he has too great a Respect for my Family, to oppofe my Father's Commands. Here her Tears interrupted her Complaint, and forc'd her to be fome time filent. She began to be perfuaded, these Men were come to take her away by the Order of Don John, who she thought had been inform'd of the Place of her Retreat, and of the Count of La Vagne's being there. She tenderly regretted the Absence of her Lover. If he knew (faid fhe to herfelf) where they are carrying me, I shou'd have less reason to be uneasly; for certainly he wou'd soon find means to see me. His Birth and Merit

Merit are fufficient Recommendations to intitle him to my Father's Favour, who being once convinc'd of the Aversion the Prince of Carency and I have to each other, wou'd undoubtedly confent to break off the Match, and yield me to the Count. Thus she travell'd all Night, entertaining herself with Reflections of this Quality.

As foon as Aurora difplay'd her gilded Beams, Leonida endeayour'd to know the Perfon who was carrying her off; But Heavens! cou'd any furprize be equal to her's when she faw it was Benavidez ? At first she had not power to speak, her Tears prevented her Utterance, whilst a Thousand different Ideas presented themselves to her Mind. She at last cry'd aloud, (no longer doubting of her Misfortune) are you become my Enemy Don Fernand? you who offer'd me your House to conceal me, and in whom I had that Confidence. Do you thus break through the Laws of Hofpitality, and force me away in this manner?-Don't accuse me unheard, Divine Leonida, (faid he, interrupting her) my Passion for you wou'd never have shin'd, had you been destin'd to the Prince of Carency by your own Inclination, as you are by the Will of your Parents. I faw with delight the Birth of your Aversion for him, which flatter'd me, that after procuring you a Retreat from the Perfecutions of your Father, whofe Authority and Refentment are not to be oppos'd, your Justice wou'd oblige you to turn your Eyes on me, and incline you to think, think, I was not fo ardently devoted to your Service, without loving you to Diftraction; but whilft I was an unfortunate Prifoner, depriv'd of all that cou'd give me Pleasure, you were entertaining the Count of La Vagne, whofe Life you had fav'd : I was inform'd of his Paffion for you, and of the favourable Re-ception you gave him. What! were all my Pains and Cares defign'd for this Stranger; and did I expofe myfelf for no other reafon, but to procure him an Opportunity of declar-ing his Love to you? Was there ever a Deftiny more unaccountable? I conjure you, Madam, to ceafe tormenting your felf; you have no just Cause to grieve. It is not your Fa-ther's House you regret, neither is it the Prince of Carency, fince your Difdain for him is fo great, that you chofe rather to quit the Court, than fee him; but you figh for the Count of La Vagne, his Absence occasions all these Tears; what Madam! ought you not to prefer me to him? Do me Justice ; fuspend your Refentment, and you will approve my Conduct. Ah! cry'd Leonida, your Offence is too great; you have behav'd yourfelf like a Traytor, and you must expect nothing but my Hatred, and that of my Family. If it be true you love me, as you fay you do, use other means to gain my Favour: Restore me my Liberty, and let me have the disposing of my Destiny; you may afterward dispute your Title to me with the Count, and deferve by your Services that Precedency, which you apprehend prehend I give him. You have one Advantage he has not, which is my being already under fome Obligations to you, and fo far I acknowledge my Gratitude; therefore I wou'd not have you forfeit the Efteem due to fo peculiar a Merit; but don't think you fhall ever prevail with me, by Force, or by a differfpectful Behaviour; your prefent Conduct is a fufficient Motive to render you odicus to me; yet upon Condition, you will obey me, I am willing to forget your Offence, and pardon the Rafhnefs of a Pafilon, which perhaps you were not Mafter of.

I penetrate into your Thoughts too well, Madam, (reply'd Benavidez) to let my felf be deceiv'd by a Difcourfe, you wou'd not have made me, had you been at Liberty to declare your Sentiments. The Count has an indifputable Advantage over me; he has had the good Fortune to acquire your Favour, but as for my part, you ever look'd on me with all the Indifferency imaginable: Your Words bear more Policy, than good Nature, and your Heart speak's for my Rival; besides, do you think me credulous enough to believe, your Anger can be fo eafily appeas'd. No, I ought not to run the hazard of lofing a Treafure, I have already in my Possession. Therefore Madam, for my Paffion's fake, pardon my not complying with your Requeft; refolve to be mine, fince by that means you can render me the happiest of Mankind. I will go with you to any part of the World, You shall be Mistrefs trefs of your Deftiny and mine; then I will obey you for ever.

Ah! Barbarian, (cry'd Leonida, in a mournful Accent) I wou'd fooner facrifice a Thoufand Lives, if I had 'em, than confent to be yours. It is not without reason, you suspected my Words. I had no other Defign in fpeaking to you, as I did, but that of retrieving my Liberty, and flying you as the crueleft of my Enemies. I fee nothing can deceive a Man who is too great a Master of Dissimulation, not to dive into the Thoughts of others. You may eafily judge, that as my Averfion for you is infinite, fo is my Refentment of the Injury you do me; but you shall not glory long in your Treachery: I had rather caft my felf into the Arms of Death, tho' never fo dreadful; than live with you, ; yes, I can find the Way to die, and in dying, meet with too great a Felicity in my defpairing Condition.

Having fpoke thefe Words with much Anger and Emotion, fhe wou'd not fay any more, nor even look at him, tho' he us'd his utmoft Endeavours to appeafe her. This was the deplorable State fhe was in, when Benavidez cmbark'd with her at Porto-Real, in order to fail for Morocco, which Paffage was then very dangerous, becaufe the Spaniards having lately defeated the King of Tunis s Fleet, the Barbarians were fo enrag'd, that they fwore they wou'd be reveng'd, and give no Quarter to any Sp.nifb Veffel.

Leonida was hardly embark'd, when a handfome young Lady came o her in a refpectful manner; manner; her Features were very regular, and her Countenance fo fweet and agreeable, that Leonida, tho' lier Grief was inexpressible, fix'd her Eyes on her with a fecret Pleafure. Her Name was Inea; fhe was Daughter to the Captain of the Ship, and shew'd an extraordinary Defire to be serviceable to our Distressed Fair, in her Affliction. I am extreamly oblig'd to you (faid Leonida to her) for the Concern you express, but I beg you will give yourfelf no farther Trouble; The Condition I am in, neither lets me seek, nor wish for Relief: Oh! leave me to my Defpair, fince nothing but Death can ease me. I have no Design to difplease you, Madam, reply'd Inea, but I think my felf under an Obligation to ferve you, in all that lies in my power. I can eafily per-ceive your Trouble is exceeding, and that your Thoughts are entirely imploy'd on fome great Difaster; but I am perfuaded, we ought never to difpair, fince the cruelest Fate may receive a favourable Change. Charming Inea, interrupted Leonida, (having heard her Name) I am almost without hopes. We are bound for Africa, and the Traytor who has forc'd me away, is carrying me into a Kingdom where he has great Power. Alas, who is it that will come to my help? Neither my Relations, nor Friends know any thing of my Misfortune; no body is acquainted with it, but a Woman, who is even as perfidious as himfelf. Thefe Words made her call to mind Cafilda; and fo fatal a Remembrance, occasion'd her to shed a Torrent rent of Tears. O Traytrefs! faid she, (as if she were present) what have I done to you, to deferve this from your Hands? 'Tis you that help'd your Brother to carry me off, and by your wicked Contrivance, I am now come to this Difgrace: You have ill rewarded the Af-fection I had for you. I hardly fuffer'd the Count of La Vagne to make Professions of Love to me, because I knew you had a Passion for him, and cou'd I have dispos'd of his and my Destiny, I wou'd not have given you the least Uneafinefs. You had no fuch generous Sentiments for me; it was by your means, your Brother knew the Affection I had for this Stranger, and at a time, that you pretended you were not deceiving me; by your false Ca-refles, you drew from me all my Secrets, which you have ungratefully abus'd, and only fought my Ruin by fuch a Difcovery. She pronounc'd thefe Words with a Paffion juftly infpir'd, and thought by unloading her Mind, fhe might give fome Eafe to her over-burthen'd Heart.

Benavidez flattering himfelf with a fuccefsful Voyage, whenever he fpoke to Leonida, entertain'd her with his Paffion, and faid, he hop'd that as fhe faw a Neceffity of fubmitting to her Fate, fhe wou'd confent to make him happy. This Difcourfe fhe heard with Contempt, and had fo little Regard for his Sighs, Tears and Menaces, that fhe never turn'd her Eyes on him, but was thinking how fhe cou'd efcape the Hands of her Ravither, which fhe wou'd 144

wou'd have couragiously done by chusing Death, had not the Sentiments of Religion oppos'd fo cruel a Resolution. As Benavidez knew his Prefence was odious to her, he feldom appear'd; but was in hopes, time wou'd make an Alteration in his Favour, and propos'd, as foon as they were arriv'd at Morocco, to find means to make her obey him, if he was not fortunate chough to render himself agreeable to her:

The Wind being fair, they foon reach'd the Streights of Gibraltar, and enter'd the Mediterrean, where having fail'd fome time, the Seamen shouted for Joy in seeing the Coast of Africa, and did not doubt, but they shou'd make the Land in a few Hours. Leonida at this News lamented her unhappy State; the went upon Deck, and caffing her melancholy Eyes over the vaft Ocean; I am looking into the Skies (faid fhe to Inea) to fee whether I can discover any dark Cloud, or Sign of an approaching Storm; I wilh you were not with me in this Ship, then shou'd I be the more willing to perifh here: But alas! how calm is the Sea, and how ferene the Air? We shall foon teach Africa, and I have nothing left my wearied Soul, but cruel Despair. Her Head was leaning on one of her Hands, and her Neck bathed with Tears that ran from her beauteous Eyes. In this Pofture Inea was endeavouring to give her fome Confolation, when fuddenly fhe cry'd, OHeavens here are too great Ships coming up to us under full fail; how unfortunate shou'd we be be, if they were Enemies? Thefe Ships belong'd to the Queen of Fez, and had difcover'd by the Flag of Benavidez's Ship, that they were Spaniards, which was a fufficient Motive to attack them, War being declar'd at that time between the two Nations; they came up to them, and tho' there was a great Inequality of Force, yet the Captain wou'd not furrender without fighting; Benavidez feconded him in his Defence with all the Courage imaginable. It diftracted him to think, he was going to lofe a Perfon he lov'd more than Life, and lofe her in fuch a manner; fince it wou'd either be by his Death, or her Captivity.

Thefe difinal Thoughts made him believe, he fhou'd have power enough to defend his Miftrefs; you fhall fee this Day, Madam, faid he, whether I deferve to be preferr'd to the Count of La Vagne: I will facrifice the laft drop of my Blood to deliver you from the Danger, you are threaten'd with; but if I dye, Adorable Leonida, remember I dye for you; and that, had not my Paffion been the Caufe, I wou'd not have committed thofe Crimes, for which I have incurr'd your Averfion.

I don't think (faid fhe, with an Air as full of Pride, as Coldnefs) that I am any ways oblig'd to thank you for what you are going to act in my Defence. I cannot fall into Hands more barbarous, nor more odious to me, than your's. Benavidez had no time to make her an Anfwer; he ran above Deck, and did fuch Actions as one wou'd have though incredible, had he L

burn'd with a milder Paffion; but this brave Spaniard was not long able to fuftain the overpowering Force of the Moors: Thofe that cou'd have feconded his Courage, were already wounded; and as he was alfo pierc'd with Wounds, he was forc'd at laft to yield, and let his feeble Body take Place among the Enemies, he had juft facrific'd to his Rage.

The young Prince Abelhamar, who had just fought him, admiring his Courage, did not fee his approaching End, without fome Concern; he commanded that nothing fhou'd be neglected to relieve him, and was going to speak to him, when he was inform'd, that feveral Ladies were found in the Cabbin. Leonida appear'd among them like a Queen in the midst of her Subjects; he was furpriz'd at her fuperior Beauty, and tho' Fear was still painted in her Face, and her Eyes had lefs Power than ufual, yet her Charms had fo great an Influence, that the Prince from aConqueror became almost a Captive. Benavidez knew her tho' dying, and made an Effort to rife, and fpeak to her. You are reveng'd, Madam, faid he, of an unfortunate Man, who never could have been capable of difpleafing you, had not his Paffion for you been proportionable to his Offence. Don't envy me the Confolation of believing, my Memory will not be odious to you, and that the Lofs of my Life may attone for my Crime.

Leonida, mov'd at fo melancholy a Sight, and her own Condition together, cou'd not reftrain her her Tears. I pardon you, Don Fernand, faid the, the Injury you have done me, and was never cruel enough to with your Death; the faid no more, feeing his Eyes were clofing, and that Palenefs had overfpread his Face. This new Scene of Misfortunes afflicted her extremely, and gave her Room to fear, the Danger which now threaten'd her was far greater than that the had efcap'd. She faw herfelf a Slave to the crueleft Enemies of the Spaniards, and was well inform'd, Don John her Father had once been a Terrour to thofe Barbarians, which made her believe, were the known, her Captivity wou'd be the more rigorous.

Whilft fhe was fill'd with these Reflections, young Abelhamar look'd on her, rather as a Divinity than a human Creature; and tho' the Admiral commanded in Chief, yet as Prince of the Blood he had all the Deference paid him, that was due to his Quality. He approach'd Leonida, whom he address'd in a most obliging manner, faying, she shou'd have no Reason to deplore her Fate, and promis'd to use all his Interest with the Queen of Fez, to restore her to her lost Liberty. He spoke Spanish very well, and Leonida return'd him Thanks for the Compassion he shew'd to her Misfortune.

Since the Condition I am in, my Lord, faid fhe, infpires you with Pity, I beg you will let me know my Fate. You fhall be obey'd, Madam, reply'd Abelhamar, as foon as you go on L 2 Board Board the Admiral; for the miferable Objects, that prefent themfelves to you here, only increafe your Melancholy; he then gave her his Hand, and conducted her on Board the other Ship.

All the Women who were taken with Leonida, follow'd her, in hopes that by her means they might be delivered from the Captivity, which threaten'd them. As foon as fhe was in the Cabbin, Abelhamar spoke to her in these Terms; You feem uneafy, Madam, to know your Deftiny; were it in my Power, I wou'd foon refign to you the Disposal of it, and efteem myfelf happy in ferving you. I am forry my ill Fortune obliges me to comply with the Admiral, who, I must inform you, has given Orders for us to return to Sallee the Capital of the Kingdom of Fez, where you will be presented to the Sultaness Celima : This Princefs is my first Coufin ; her Father had her brought up in a Caftle by the Seafide, and one Day as fhe was walking on the Shore, attended only by her Women, fome Corfairs, who were at a Diftance, perceiving her, landed fuddenly, and finding the was very handfom, took her and carry'd her to Bajazet, who rewarded 'em confiderably for their Prefent.

This Emperor of the Turks, in fpight of his natural Haughtinefs, became diffractedly in Love with this Princefs, whofe Charms were fo tranfcendent, that fhe receiv'd the greateft Marks of Diffinction from the proudeft Prince in the World.

World. Celima made her Father acquainted with her Fate, who, taking Advantage of the Influence she had over the Emperor, prevail'd with him to lend him Men and Money, in order to dethrone my Father, who then poffefs'd the Crown by his Birth-Right, and the Laws of the Land; accordingly he not only fucceed-ed in the Enterprize, but even depriv'd him of his Life; and as my Youth cou'd give him no Apprehension, he was contented with keeping me confin'd in his Palace.

Bajazet carried his Arms into Millia, and took Celima with him, who was Witness of the Advantages he gain'd over the French and Hungarians; but this Prince's Fortune met with a strange Turn; his Army was defeated by Tamerlane the Great, and Himself taken Pri-foner in the Battle. Celima, notwithstanding his Overthrow, found Means to make her Escape, and return'd to Sallee, where her Father receiv'd her with Joy proportionable to her Me-rit; fome Time after, he and his Son dying, the Crown fell to this Princefs, who took effectual Measures to fecure it. It was thought at first, she had a Design to marry me, which wou'd have partly made Amends for the Wrongs I had fuffer'd from her Family, but fhe has folemnly declar'd against Marriage, tho' Young and Handfome; and the melancholy Life she leads, makes People suspect, she is affected with fome deep Concern, which cannot be attributed to the Captivity of Bajazet, fince she has often protested, she wou'd ra-rather he the Laft of his Slaves, than the Firft of his Favourites; fhe feldom fees any Company, but has a great many beautiful Slaves, which are brought to her from all Parts of the World; and as fhe is extremely unwilling to reftore them to their Liberty when fhe likes them, I very much fear you will acquire fo great a Share in her Favour, that fhe will not part with you; I wou'd prevent this Misfortune were fhe lefs abfolute, but fhe is fo Jealous of my Actions, that fhou'd I releafe you, it wou'd be fufficient to make her think me Criminal.

Alas, my Lord! interrupted Leonida, I am now too well fatisfy'd, I fhall pafs the reft of my Days in an unhappy Captivity; yet I own, the Danger I have cfcap'd from the Power of him that forc'd me away, appear'd to me much more terrible. Abelhamar defir'd fhe wou'd acquaint him with her Adventure, which fhe related with all the Grace imaginable, but conceal'd Benavidez's Name and her own, telling him, her's was Felicia of Leon, and fo difguis'd her whole Story after the fame Manner.

Leonida having entertain'd him fome Hours, he order'd a Repaft to be ferv'd, then retir'd, leaving her with Inea, who was lamenting the Misfortune fhe had receiv'd by the Death of the Captain of their Ship, who had been kill'd in the Fight. Oh Father! faid fhe, Why have I loft You, or Why did I not die with You? What are become of all my Hopes? They are vanish'd, and the Remainder of my Life will be

be a continu'd Scene of Mifery. I am now a Slave, and dare not flatter my felf with any Relief from my Relations, who will never ranfom me: You were every Thing to me, and your paternal Love was my only Joy. Tho Leonida's Troubles were great enough, and flie not in a Condition to comfort any One, her Natural Generofity and Tendernefs wou'd not permit her to forget Inea on fo fad an Occafion. She approach'd her, and embracing her faid, my Dear Inea, do not indulge your felf in these Complaints; you see I am as unhappy as you are, yet bear my Missor-tunes with more Resolution. Ah' Madam ! reply'd Inea, you have lefs Reafon to complain than I, or more Courage to fupport you. As to what regards me, every Thing has contri-buted to load me with Torments! my Father, pierc'd with Wounds, is reprefented to my afflicted Mind, and by his Lofs, all my agreea-ble Hopes are for ever destroy'd. What have I not done, ye mighty Powers, cried fhe, to attempt this Voyage? I had at laft compafs'd it, and was flattering my felf with Succefs; but you fee, Madam, how little we must depend on Fortune, which binds me with Chains, ata Time that I expected to enjoy a perfect Felicity. In ending these Words, (which were often interrupted with Sighs) she turn'd her Eyes on Leonida, and seeing her Face was bath'd in Tears, did not doubt but her Difcourfe had affected her, which gave fome Eafe to Inea. Alas! how generous you are, Madam, L 4.

dam, faid fhc, to fhare my Troubles; I am fo fenfible of your Goodnefs, that I with nothing more, than an Opportunity of giving you an Evincement of my Gratitude; you have this Day gain'd a Heart, Madam, which fhall for ever be at your Devotion. The Compaffion I have for you, Inea, faid Leonida, you well deferve; and I proteft to you, I fhall much lefs deplore my Misfortune, if by its Means-I acquire your Friendship. We are Both of us Captives, and as yet unacquainted with our future Deftiny; but whatever happens, I hope we shall be together, that we may tell our Pain to each other, which is the only Thing can give Relief to the Unfortunate.

These melancholy Reflections led her into Those of a deeper Nature, to which she entirely abandon'd her felf, and continu'd weeping bitterly most Part of the Night; then complaining, file cried; Why don't you come, my Dear Count of La Vagne, and deliver me from the Hands of our common Enemies? Oh! how agreeable fhou'd I think fuch a Change of Fortune; after fo confiderable a Service, my Father cou'd not deny giving me to you, and the Prince of Carency wou'd be overjoy'd at having cfcap'd a Marriage, to which he had fo great an Averfion: But alas! (continued fhe) How far am I from this happy State? My Infelicity is real, and I cannot acquaint you with it.' I know not in what Manner the Queen of Fez may treat me; it's probable you will never hear of me, and Death only will terminate my Mifery. She would have pafs'd the reft of the Night in these fad Repinings, if Inea (who was much troubled for her) had not diverted her Thoughts. Pardon me, Madam, faid she, for interrupting you, and let me intreat you to take a little Repose: They fay, we are to land to Morrow at Sallee; Wou'd you appear before the Queen under fo. deep a Concern? Qur Dependance is on your Perfections, and we believe, her Majefty will be fo pleafed with you, that by her Favour, you may foon contribute to our Liberty: But, Madam, were it only for your own fake, preferve those Charms, which I fancy have already touch'd Prince Abelhamar ; fine Ladies may. expect every Thing from their Beauty. Oh! Inea, What do you tell me? (replied)

Leonida, fetching a deep Sigh,) How different are your Sentiments from mine? The unhappy Experience I have made of a violent Paffion, gives me too just a Cause to fear the like Difaster; tho' if you confider well the Figure we shall make in the Court, where we are going, as being Christians, we must rather expect to be flighted by those Barbarians, and exposid to their Cruelty; but there is nothing I wou'd not prefer to the Misfortune of being belov'd by Abelbamar: You imagin'd, my Dear Inea, that fuch a Conquest wou'd flatter my Vanity; yet for my own Satisfaction, I will sooner believe you milinterpreted his Meaning, and thought, what he acted out of Generofity, proceeded from some other Motive; however, TIM fince fince you defire it, I will endeavour to take a little Reft; in finishing these Words, she embrac'd Inea, and laid her self on the Bed.

- Love had already made a great Progress in the Heart of Abelhamar, who was fo taken with the Beauty of Leonida, (whom we must again call Felicia) that the Thoughts of lofing her, when once prefented to the Queen, gave him much Uneafinefs. Is it poffible (faid he to Mula, who was his Favourite,) that I can deliver up this Divine Creature to the Power of my mortal Enemy? Why has Fate order'd, I shou'd be the Author of her Captivity? How fhall I, after fuch a Conduct, evince her of my Sentiments? Will the not have Room to loadme with Reproaches, which must be fucceeded by her Averfion? He was now ruminating on a Thousand different Projects : First, hehad no Mind fhe shou'd land at Sallee; then he thought how he might carry her off at his Arrival there; and after all, wou'd thus examine himfelf; From whence proceed thefe Motions? Sure I am not in Love? Have I had Time to conceive a Paffion for this Fair Stranger? No, no, faid he, it is only the Effect of Surprize and Admiration, which will have no farther Confequence, and I shall forget her in ceasing to fee her; yet if she shou'd become dear to me, continued he, I can ask her of the Queen, who, I believe, will not refuse me One Slave out of fo great a Number : Celima, in making me a Prefent of this Young Lady, whom I might have kept without her Confent, will will think the highly obliges me, and I dare affure my felf, the will be ready to give me fuch a Proof of her Goodnets, at a Time that I have Pretentions to greater Favours.

This Opinion compos'd a little the Agitation his Mind was in, but its Calm was not long : Ah, Mula, faid he, it is not Celima alone can oppose my Good Fortune ; Felicia is the Perfon who must decide my Destiny. Can I flatter my felf, that she is not already engag'd ? If the has an Inclination for any One in Spain, I must not expect she will be favourable to me; I shall appear in her Eyes as a Tyrant, that forces her from the Arms of the Man she loves. Mula us'd all Arguments to perfwade him into a better Conceit of his Perfonal Merit; but as in Affairs of Love, the least Uncertainty is a cruel Torment, he pass'd that Night betwixt Hope and Fear, without taking any Refolution.

At the first Appearance of Morning, he grew impatient to fee Felicia, and hearing she was up, went to her Apartment: She receiv'd him with much Civility, but seem'd extremely dejected, which griev'd Abelhamar, who us'd many tender Words to express his Concern. After a short Conversation, she beg'd Leave to go upon Deck; he readily confented to her Request, being desirous to embrace any Opportunity of obliging her, and immediately order'd it to be spread with a Rich Carper, and Cushions of Cloth of Gold, then conducted her to the Place that was prepar'd, and fat down down by her under a Magnificent Canopy. They were fome Time without fpeaking to one another; for Felicia having turn'd her Looks towards the Coast of Spain, cou'd not forbear melting into a Flood of Tears, which threw Abelhamar into fo deep a Melancholy, that he had no Power to interrupt her. At last the recover'd a little from that Excess of Grief, and broke Silence : The Refpect that is due to you, my Lord, faid she, ought to make me conceal my Affliction in your Prefence, but your generous Compassion hinders me from laying fo great a Violence on my Spirits; I must let my Sorrow take its Course, fince it is the only Relief I can expect in my deplorable Condition. Here, forc'd away from my Friends, my Country, and a confiderable Fortune, I am fuddenly become Slave to a Queen, who perhaps will not grant me my Liberty at any Rate. Alas! my Lord, Is there no Means left to deliver me from this Misfortune? The Prince, no longer Master of his Passion, flung himself on his Knees, and taking her Hand, Divine Stranger, faid he, judge better of your transcendent Charms : You are not yet arriv'd at Sallee, and 'tis in your Choice not to go there at all: I adore you, amiable Felicia, for it is impossible you shou'd not infpire fomething more than Love: If fuch Sentiments merit your Favour, here I lay my Fortune at your Feet; do not difdain the Vows of a Prince, who in Right ought now to be King of Fez. Oh, that I had a Crown in my Pof-

Possession, I wou'd place it on your Head, if you thought me worthy of wearing it with you; yet I have fome Friends left, and a Sanctuary to go to; Come, Madam, then let us away, fo that I poffefs you, all my Ambition will be fatisfy'd. Ah, my Lord, (faid Felicia, interrupting him,) do not follow the Dictates of an Infant Paffion, which may caufe you to blush hereafter; confider you are speaking to a Christian Captive, who has Gratitude and Generofity enough, not to accept Offers, which might occafion your Ruin: I am indebted to you, it's true, yet think what I owe to my felf. It wou'd be impossible for me to confent to go with you, without being the Author of your Difgrace, and my eternal Shame. The Difference of our Laws and Religion, the Inequality of our Fortunes, and our little Knowledge of each Other, all These oppose such a Defign; and fhou'd I leave my felf to your Care, you your felf wou'd tax me with the greateft Imprudence. Continue, Madam, (re-plied Abelhamar with Impatience,) and rather fay, you love fome Perfon in Spain. Say, cruel Creature, you have an Aversion to me, which is the only Motive of your Confideration. Ah Felicia! How eafily might we overcome all these Difficulties, were you inspired, like me, with a tender Passion? And how little wou'd you reflect on the Confequences of an Engagement, which flatters us with fo per-fect a Felicity? But alas! I fee too well, you prefer the Queen of Fez's Chains to that Liberty berty I now offer you. Here leaning his Head upon his Hands, he filently exprefs d his Pain with Sighs that prevented his Utterance : Felicia continued speaking to him with much Sweetnefs and Prudence; but foon forgeting he was near her, fhe relaps'd into her former Affliction, at the Thoughts of her unhappy Deftiny. They were Both in this Situation, when the Admiral (who at a Diftance had obferv'd them fome Time,) approach'd the Prince, and ask'd him whether he was difpos'd to Eat; Who having recover'd from the little Diforder he was in, made Anfwer, it shou'd be as Felicia pleas'd. This beauteous Lady, blufhing, faid to him, You do not reflect, my Lord, that I am a Captive here, who alas, has no Command. Ah, Madam! reply'd he, (fpeaking to her in a low Voice) you know too well the unlimited Power you have, whereever I am, and no Body feels the Effect of it more than I: If your Empire is fo great in Misfortunes, what wou'd it be at another Time ? In ending these Words, they were interrupted by the joyful Shouts of the Sea-men, who had just discover'd the Coasts of the Kingdom of Fez, which News struck Felicia with Confternation; for whilft fhe was at Sca, fhe had some Hopes, that either a Tempest wou'd arife, and cast them upon the Coast of Spain, or that the Spanish Fleet, which was then Abroad, wou'd retake 'em ; but she was too well affured, that being once landed at Sallee, she cou'd not any more expect to be reliev'd.

157

Abel-

Abelhamar, on his Side, thought Death lefs terrible, than parting with this Young Lady, whom he wou'd foon be oblig'd to yield up to the Sultanefs; and as he had not much Time to remain with her, he employ'd thofe Hours in reprefenting his Passion to her in the fostest Language, Love and Respect cou'd inspire; but she receiv'd his Addresses with so much Coldness, that he began to despair of meeting with an obliging Return. They were now arriv'd at Sallee; and as

They were now arriv'd at Sallee; and as Abelhamar cou'd not refolve to go himfelf, and prefent Felicia to the Queen of Fez, he told the Admiral he was indifpos'd, therefore defired he wou'd excufe him to her Majefly for not waiting on her. He approach'd Felicia at the fame Time, and faid, it's you, Madam, that hinders me from making my Court to Day; for I cannot attend you to a Place where you go with fo much Reluctancy; but be affured, that in Spite of your Indifferency, I fhall not omit any Thing to deliver you from your Confinement. You are too generous, my Lord, reply'd fhe, in endeavouring to contribute to my Satisfaction, which will be purchas'd very dear, if it fhou'd hereafter give you the leaft Chagrin.

Abelhamar retired exceeding melancholy, and foon after, Felicia, Inea, and the Reft of the Slaves, were fet on Shore by the Admiral's Command, in order to be fent to the Queen. Alas! my dear Inea, faid Felicia, (looking at her with a dejected Air,) we fee our felves going going into Captivity; and, till now, the civil Treatment of Abelhamar, prevented us from feeling the full Weight of our Misfortunes: This Prince now leaves us, and the fine Palace we fee, is to be our Prifon. At thefe Words, fhe cou'd not reftrain the Courfe of her Tears, and Inea kept her Company in this difmal Scene, till they alighted at the first Court of the Castle, from whence they were immediately carry'd to the Queen.

They found her feated on a Carpet of Gold, beautify'd with Diverfity of Colours, and round her were feveral embroider'd Cufhions enrich'd with Pearl; fhe was drefs'd in a Turkifb Habit of Silver Brocade, Flower'd with Crimfon, and Button'd with Diamonds and Emeralds; her Girdle, which was fet with Precious Stones, girded a little Poigniard to her Side; Part of her Hair was tuck'd under a Muzlin Veil, ftrip'd with Gold, and the reft hung in Treffes down her Neck; her Eyes, which were Large and Black, tho' languifhing, fhin'd with irrefiftible Luftre; but in her Mein was painted fo much Pride and Haughtinefs, that it rob'd her of Part of her Charms, and render'd her awful to All that approach'd her.

Leonida (attended by the Women who were taken with her,) came and flung her felf at the Queen's Feet, who thought her a furprizing Beauty; fhe chofe her and Inea to be of her Chamber, and gave the reft to the Admiral to difpofe of as he pleas'd. The Queen knew Leonida was a Spaniard by her Drefs, there-therefore speaking to her in that Language, ask'd her Name, and to what Part of the World fhe was going when they took her; to which fhe answer'd, her Name was Felicia, that a Gentleman had run away with her, who told her, he intended to carry her to Morocco; but that he had been kill'd in the Engagement, and fhe thought her felf too happy in her Misfortunes, to fall into the Hands of fo great a Queen. She finish'd these Words with to weak an Accent, that Celima eafily perceiv'd fhe was under a great Affliction. She extremely pity'd the Youth of this Lady, whole noble Air perfwaded her, fhe was of Eminent Birth. Be under no Concern, Felicia, faid she, to her; I fhall extend my Goodness to you; there are greater Troubles than those you are to undergo in this Palace: You must not judge of Felicity by Appearances, and I know not, after enquiring into your Condition, and that of fome Sovereigns I have heard of, but your's is more Happy; for, 1 believe, added ihe, your Heart has prefer'd its Liberty, being uncommon for One at your Age to receive an Im-pression of Love. Leonida made no Reply, but looking on the Ground, chang'd Colour, and fetch'd a deep Sigh. Celima, who only fpoke to her in this Manner to difcover the Motions of her Heart, observing her Disorder, perceiv'd fhe was touch'd with a fecret Paffion, but did not take any farther Notice of it.

A little after, the Governess of the Slaves order'd Felicia and Inea, to follow her to that M Part Part of the Palace affign'd for their Ufe, where fhe made 'em change their Cloaths; and as they were to wait on the Queen, fhe gave them very rich Stuffs for their Drefs: They generally went Bare-headed, with their Hair falling negligently on their Shoulders, and as a Mark of Servitude, wore Golden Bracelets, and Chains on their Arms; when they attended the Queen to any Place, they had large White Veils of an extraordinary fine Stuff, which cover'd their Head, and Part of their Face.

Felicia appear'd as beautiful in this new Apparel, as in that she had just put off, and her Actions were accompanied with so much Grace, that nothing feem'd ftrange to her. They carried her into a Room, where they were teaching the Slaves to fing, and play upon Inftruments, which furpriz'd her extremely, not expecting to fee fo great a Number of Handfom Creatures, as if Celima had the Privilege of choosing them out of all the Courts in the Univerfe. These Captives show'd no less Admiration in feeing Felicia; they all came up to falute her, and amongst them, she observ'd a young Lady, whofe Air was fo Majestick and Charming, that she took a particular Delight in looking at her; but what increas'd her Attention, was, the Fancy she had to have seen her fomewhere before, and that the was not unknown to her: They express'd an extraordinary Civility to each other, and as there is generally a greater Sympathy between unfortunate Perfons than others, these Two Fair Captives mutually contracted a particular Friendship.

From thence, Felicia; in her new Drefs, was carry'd to the Queen, but made no Stay in her Apartment. Soon after, Abelhamar (forgetting he had defired the Admiral to make his Excufes to Celima, for not paying his Court to her that Night,) ran impatiently to the Palace, and feem'd extremely/uneafy, when he perceiv'd Felicia was not with her. He did not prefume to mention any Thing concerning her, but the Queen faluted him in these Terms : You have brought me a lovely Spaniard, whom you shall fee prefently in her Slave's Drefs; I am perswaded, you will not think her less beautiful than before ;- and I must tell you, I have learnt fince your Departure, that she who was taken in the Island of Sardinia, is the Daughter of Brancaleon Doria, her Name is 0lympia, and— here she is, (continu'd the Queen, seeing her enter the Apartment) she will inform you of fomething particularly furprizing. Celima commanded her to entertain the Prince with her Story, which fhe obey'd, and Felicia coming in at the fame Time, ap-proach'd Olympia, who began the enfuing Relation.

A young Count extremely Handsom, and of a Merit fo shining, that he was universally admir'd, fell in Love with me; I made him no disobliging Return, thinking my Father wou'd be very well satisfy'd to give me to a Person M 2 of 164 of his Quality, and one who had highly diffinguifh'd himfelf in the World. His Confent, my Lord, was the only Thing wanting to make us Happy; but alas! we little forefaw the Difficulties that oppos'd our Defires.

My Father difpleas'd with this Nobleman's Family, look'd on him, and all his Relations, as Enemies; however, for a long Time, his politick Reafons oblig'd him to conceal his true Sentiments, which he discover'd, when my Marriage was propos'd to him; it was then we knew with mortal Difpleafure, that Time only cou'd relieve us; we both labour'd under all the Vexation, that fuch a Difappointment was capable of giving us; and as our Affection daily increas'd, we cou'd not deny our felves the Satisfaction of private Interviews; my Father was acquainted with our Proceedings, which being opposite to his Inclinations, made him fo angry, that he told me in the greatest Passion, he wou'd revenge my Difobedience to him on the Object I lov'd. These Menaces caus'd me to tremble for this young Lord, whom I conjured to abfent for fome Time, and foon after, a glorious Occafion invited him to go Abroad. Bagazet had conquer'd a great Part of the Levant, and the King of Hungary endeavouring to beat him out of it, apply d himfelf for Succour to most of the Princes of Europe, who readily fent him all poffible Affistance. Tho' I confider'd this to be a long and tedious Journey, and even apprehended all the Dangers the Count might be n, be expos'd to, yet through the Necessity of his Absence, I seconded the Desire he had of going to Missia.

We exchang'd Vows of eternal Conftancy to each other, and the Grief we felt at parting I thought wou'd have coft us our Lives. 5 The Event of the Campaign was very unhappy, the Christian Troops were defeated, and the Count taken Prisoner, which News I, heard with a Concern, not to be deferib'd; Isfent him Money to pay his Ranfom, and was, expecting his Return with the last Impatience, when I receiv'd an Account of his Death. It is hard, my Lord, to imagine, how cruelly fuch a Lofs affected me. I cou'd no longer reftrain my Sorrow. I perfecuted my Father with Reproaches, and wou'd not permit either my Relations or Friends to fee me; I thought Life it felf infupportable, and beg'd of Heaven to fhorten its Date, that I might be eas'd of the Torment I then endur'd.

This was my melancholy Condition, when flumb'ring one Night, my Mind fill'd with my Misfortunes, I fuddenly awak'd, and faw a Perfon near me, whom at firft I took for the Shade of my Deceas'd Lover: Such an Apparition wou'd have terribly frightened me, had my Paffion been lefs violent. I found afterwards by his Difcourfe, that far from being with a Phantom, I had Caufe to believe he was the fame lovely Man, fo dear to me. At this Sight, I abandon'd my felf to all the Joy, that cou'd attend fuch a Surprize, and fhew'd M 3 166 to this Cavalier all possible Marks of Affection; he was cruel enough not to undeceive me, and I was not fensible of my Error till the Day following, when by Chance, my Father brought him into a Grotto, where I had retir'd to indulge my felf with the pleasing Thoughts of the Count's being reftor'd to Life.

I was then inform'd, this Gentleman, whom I had taken for him, had never feen me before, which fenfibly touch'd me; I was fo asham'd of this Mistake, that my Affliction had like to have put a Period to my Days. My Father was extremely mov'd at my Condition, and as I knew his Sentiments, I did not doubt but he wou'd oblige me in any Thing I defir'd; therefore embracing the Occafion, I conjured him in most preffing Terms, to give out that I was Dead, and permit me to go to my Mother, who was then in Sardignia, which he readily assented to. I had not far from Cagliary an Aunt, who was Abbess of a famous Monastry, that lay in a Wilderness near the Sea-Side, where I intended to end my deplorable Life, conceal'd from the Sight of any Object, that might renew my Sufferings.

My Father, notwithstanding the Chagrin this Separation gave him, disposid every Thing for my Departure, and the News of my Death was spread Abroad, without any One's thinking it supposid. I immediately left Genoa, and my Voyage had nothing Remarkable in it; for I soon arriv'd in Sardignia, where my Mother receiv'd me, and without Deliberation

confented to what I fo much with'd. She carry'd me to her Sifter, who was the Depofitory of my Secrets, and having chang'd my Name, I led a Life fo retir'd, that without being of the Number of the Dead, I cou'd not be reckon'd amongft the Living; but I us'd often to be alarm'd with Letters from my Father, prefing me to quit my Solitude in order to return Home, which made me apprehend, he wou'd ufe his Authority to compel me to it; therefore I went and flung my felf at my Aunt's Feet, and conjured her to give me the Nun's Veil; that having once made Vows, my Relations might lofe the Hopes of my returning again into the World.

She at first oppos'd my Request, believing she ought not to make such a Step, without the Advice of my Friends; but at last my Prayers and Tears prevail'd on her. She defir'd the Bission of Cagliary to perform the Ceremony; and as it is the Custom in that Place, for the Person who takes the Habit of a Novice, to go with a Number of young Ladies, to hear the Prelate in a little Chappel by the Sea-Side, I went out drefs'd in a long Gown, Brocaded with Silver, my Hair hanging loose on my Shoulders, and my Head crown'd with Flowers; my Companions were also drefs'd in White, and in this Manner we form'd a Procession along the Shore.

It's now, faid I, my Dear Count, that I am going to facrifice to you the reft of an unhappy Life, which was deftin'd to be your's. M 4 Were Were you fenfible in the Region where you are, of what I do for you in this World, you wou'd rejoyce to have infpir'd me with fuch Sentiments. I was loft in thefe Thoughts; when I heard a great Noife; the Cries of my Companions oblig'd me to look behind me, where I faw feveral Men following us with their Swords drawn. I endeavour'd to make my Efcape, but two of them being come up to me, carry'd me off, with fome of the young Ladies; and having forc'd us into a Boat, row'd immédiately up to their Ship, where we were under Sail before any one cou'd come to our Afliftance.

One may eafily imagine, that fuch a Surprize terrified us extremely; but it was nothing to the inexprefible Grief which feiz'd us, when we found our felves in the Hands of a Corfair of Algier, neither our Prayers nor Tears had Power to foften him; all his Thoughts were fix'd on making the most of our Captiviry. He foon lost Sight of Sardignia, and after having taken other Prizes, steer'd his Courfe towards Sallee, being fure to fell fome of us to the Queen, who was pleas'd to chuse me (as you know, my Lord,) out of a Motive of Pity; for I was fo very melancholy, that none cou'd fee me without Compassion.

It never came into my Head to acquaint my Father with my Captivity, nor did I with the Recovery of my Liberty, which I was going to offer as a Sacrifice, when the Corfair took me. It was equal to me, to be thut up in the Palace of Sallee, or in a Monastry; fince I had no no other Defire, than that of leaving the World, and paffing the Remainder of an unfortunate Life without any Engagement.

In this State, were my Affairs, and I daily receiving new Favours from the Queen, when a Merchant of Genoa, who deals in Jewels, came to this Court. Her Majesty being defirous to fee what valuable Things he had to difpofe of, fent for him, and I was near her, when he enter'd the Apartment. He no sooner cast his Eyes on me, but feem'd aftonish'd; for he did not doubt of my being Dead, as it was reported; yet in feeing me, he had Caufe enough to believe, I was Brancaleon Doria's Daughter; fince he had spoken to me too often at my Father's House, not to know me again; and as he immediately perceiv'd I knew him, it fo confirm'd his Opinion, that he defir'd Leave to fpeak with me, which he obtain'd of the Queen. Is it possible, Madam, you shou'd thus neglect Writing to your Friends, who fo infinitely love you, and are lamenting your Death at Genoa, whilft you are Living, and a Slave at Sallee ? Who bemoans me? (faid I, with a melancholy Accent :) Do you believe, that after the fatal Deftiny of a Person, who was dearer to me than Life, I cou'd find any Relish for the World? No, as my Paffion was great, fo was my Sorrow; and no other Motive induc'd me to spread Abroad my pretended Death, only to retire into fome Solitude, and there forever regret the Lofs of a Man I fo dearly lov'd. In finishing these Words, I burst out in Tears, and

and the Jeweller fixing his Eyes on mc with Admiration; you deferve a better Fate, Madam, faid he, and I efteem my felf happy, to have met with this Opportunity of affuring you, the Gentleman you actually deplore, did not perifh as it was related; he arriv'd at Genoa a little after the Report of your Death, at which he was fo touch'd, that his Trouble is not to be defcrib'd; he admitted me to fee him often, but his Grief wou'd feldom allow him to fpeak, and whenever he broke Silence, it was with your Name; he afterwards fell dangeroufly ill, and as foon as he recover'd, went to Travel; but he is now return'd to Genoa, and I can give you Teftimonies, Madam, of his eternal Love.

We were in a Place pretty diftant from the Queen, who cou'd not hear our Conversation; but I was fo transported at this News, that (without knowing what I did, or confidering why,) I ran and flung my felf at her Feet; at first I was not able to speak, my Eyes gush'd out with Tears, and I look'd at her in fo moving a manner, that the ask'd me feveral times what was my Requeft ? The Merchant being -a Man of Senfe, came up, and explain'd the Meaning of my Diforder; and as I had time to recover my felf during their Difcourse ; Ah Madam ! faid I to the Queen, I entreat your Majesty to give me my Liberty; I am now willing to live, and wifhmy felf at Genoa, fince my Misfortunes are at an end. No Creature was more wretched than I, and now, none is more happy. I proteft to you, Madam, I daily faw the 1124

the Light with Pain, having as I thought, loft the only Perfon that cou'd make my Felicity, and defir'd Death to terminate my Miferies, as it had done his. I cannot call to mind all I faid to the Queen, who was pleas'd to hear me with a great deal of Condescension; and being inform'd who I was, as a particular Proof of her Esteem for my Family, she restor'd me to my Liberty, for which I return'd her Majesty repeated Thanks. I ask'd the Jeweller a great many Questions, and defir'd he wou'd procure me Conveniencies for my Passage in the next Ship that shou'd fale for Genoa; but after having made more ferious Reflections, I thought it prudent, not to put my felf into my Father's Power, till I had first confulted the Count, and taken Meafures with him to fucceed in our mutual Defires, without running any Rifque of meeting with new Obstacles.

After these Considerations, I wrote to him by the fame Merchant, who is return'd to Genea, in order to bring him here : This is, my Lord, what has pass'd during your Absence, which the Queen commanded me to relate to you.

Abelhamar thank'd her Majefty, and afterwards Olympia, for whom he had always (hown a particular Value. You have no reafon now to complain, Madam, faid he to her; Hymen is going to reward you for all the Pains Love has made you fuffer: You'll foon fee the Object of your Affection, and unite your Deftinies. Ah! how happy is fuch a State? In ending these Words, he figh'd and look'd languifhingly. guishingly at Felicia, who turn'd her Eyes on the Ground, fearing they shou'd meet his; he also endeavour'd to speak to her, but she carefully avoided his Approach. This Proceeding so deeply affected the Prince, that he retir'd almost in Despair. The Queen, who was troubled with a secret Uncasines, went into her Closet to indulge her usual Melancholy, and the Slaves repaired to their Apartment.

Felicia finding Inea in her Chamber, embrac'd her with as much Pleafure, as if she had not feen her of a long time. We have, faid she, illustrious Companions in our Servitude; that fine Creature they call Olympia, is Daughter to the famous Doria; I have just now heard her Story, which the related to Prince Abelhamar. Oh Heavens! my dear Inea, how worthy of Envy is her Fate ? fhe will foon fee her Lover, whofe Death was fo furely believ'd, that after his Lofs fhe determin'd to facrifice the Remainder of her Life to Solitude ; if you ever have felt a tender Passion, you may imagine how agreeable fuch a Meeting will prove to them: Her Eyes already fhine with an unknown Lustre, and express the Motions of a fatisfy'd Mind. Alas! continu'd she, how different is her Cafe and mine? I conceive, Madam, interrupted Inea, your Uneafinefs does not proceed entirely from your Captivity; were I permitted to fay more, I fhou'd judge, your Heart was concern'd in the Sighs and Tears which fometimes you cannot reftrain : Relieve your felf in complaining, Madam, and if you think think me worthy of being your Confident, I dare affure you, I shall never forfeit that Honour by divulging your Secret. I am perfuaded of your Sincerity, my Dear, reply'd Felicia, and think my felf, happy to have met with a Perfon, in whom I can confide; but if I relate my melancholy Story to you, I hope you'll oblige me with a Recital of yours, and believe, what I defire, does lefs proceed from my Curiofity, than the particular Interest I have in all that concerns you. I flatter my felf with what you are pleas'd to fay, lovely Felicia, reply'd Inea, and to shew how obedient I am to any thing you command, I will now give you a Relation of my Misfortunes.

The Story of Inca.

LY=3 1810

I Am born of a noble Family of Andalusta, where my Father had a good Eftate, and marry'd a Lady, who brought him no Fortune; he was ever thought a gallant Man, and being bred up to the Sea from his Infancy, the King gave him a Ship of War; he has left two Daughters, my eldest Sister's Name is Mathilda, who is very handfom. We us'd to fee but little Company, according to the Cuftom of Spain ; but my Father having receiv'd into his House, a young Gentleman of a diftinguish'd Family in Toledo, whofe Name is Don Ramire of Castro, a secret Sympathy dispos'd his Heart and mine, to receive Impressions for each other. I was pleas'd at his gentle Air, his Wit, and foft N- BOOK

foft infinuating manner, which engaged me unawares; and we were not long acquainted; before he declar'd, I had infpir'd him with the tenderest Passion.

He thought himfelf happy in wearing my Chains. His Fortune and Merit gave him fuch-Advantages, that he had no room to apprehend any of my Friends wou'd oppofe his Felicity, and I was of the fame Opinion ; for tho' I refifted the Infant Inclination I had for him, it proceeded only from the fear I had of its not being fincerely return'd. How unfortunate shou'd I be, faid I to my felf, were my Affection plac'd on a Man, who might receive it with Indifference? I ought, before it's too late, refolve to fly, and deny my Eyes the Pleafure they take in feeing him. The juft Diffidence I had of my own Merit, oblig'd me to be very referv'd to Don Ramire, and behave my felf in a manner quite opposite to my Sentiments, which inclin'd him to believe, I had conceiv'd an Aversion for him; this Thought did not only afflict him, but made him fo timerous, that he had not Power to fpeak to me. I examin'd all his Actions with great Care, and when we were together, he appear'd extremely penfive ; I attributed this to the weak Impression I had made on him, which created in me much Uncafinefs, and I did the greatest Violence to my felf in not fhowing my Concern; but tho' our Minds were prepoffess'd, yet our Eyes, meeting fometimes, cou'd not help confessing the inward Motion Motion of our Hearts. Ah! too indifferent Don Ramire, thought I, if you are really touch'd, in what manner wou'd your Looks express it, fince without being fo, they speak the foft Language of Love? He told me afterwards, he had conceiv'd the same Idea of me, and discover'd in my Eyes something which wou'd have flatter'd him, had I not given him too many Instances of my Insensibility.

My Sifter pass'd some time in studying our Looks, and was endeavouring to know whe-ther we had a Paffion for each other, having her felf a fecret reafon to be inform'd of the Truth ; all the Care fhe took, ferv'd only to perfwade her, there was no Love between us, and that fhe might undertake what the pleas'd without Apprehension. Don Ramire appear'd as agreeable in her Eyes, as he did in mine; but the Difference of his Proceedings with her was very remarkable : It came into his Head, first to acquire her Friendship, that afterwards he might make her his Confident, and fo by degrees, engage her in his Interest. Thus one may fee, how blind is Love, in fome of his Projects ; for there was very little Probability, that Mathilda wou'd act in fuch a Character. She was my Mother's Favourite, as my eldest Sifter had a Right to be married before me ; therefore (Don Ramire being the only Perfon. who then feem'd defirous to make an Alliance with our Family) it was thought but just, she shou'd have the Precedency. e - Lo harrow

I was not long, before I discover'd her Intentions, and my Uncafinefs met with fo vaft an Addition, that it had like to have thrown me into Defpair. What (faid I, complaining of my Fate) am I already jealous? I who can hardly tell what it is to love, and must I feel a thousand different Pains, which ought to be unknown to one of my Age? Methinks, I cou'd approve his Passion, were he dispos'd to like me; yet I have avoided him with the fame Caution, I wou'd have done the Man I hate; was ever Conduct like mine? My Sifter is. taking Advantage of my Timidity ; she is belov'd, and in fpite of that, I ftill harbour fuch Sentiments as ought to make me blufh, fince they will render me the unhappiest Creature in the World.

Don Ramire, whole Perplexity of Mind was not inferior to mine, cou'd no longer be filent; and as Mathilda gave him all Opportunities of entertaining her, one Evening as they were walking together in one Ally of the Garden, and I in another, (unknown to them, and at too great a Distance to hear what they were faying) I perceiv'd he was talking to her with a great deal of Emotion; at last I faw him fling himfelf at her Feet, and taking her Hand, kifs'd it fo ardently, that I no ways doubted but he had just declar'd his Passion to her; which meeting with an obliging Reception, occasion'd those Transports in him. Oh H 2vens! what a Sight was this to a Perfon in my Condition? I wou'd no longer observe them, them, but wenr into an Arbour at the end of the Ally, not having Strength enough to fupport me, nor Power to refift the Courfe of my Grief.

There I threw my felf on the Ground, leaning my Head on a Bench, and covering my Face with my Veil, I shed a Shower of Tears. Oh! how cruel is my Deftiny, faid I? Don Ramire and Mathilda love each other; fhe has heard his Declaration, and given him a favourable Audience, for which, he made his Retributions to her on his Knees, and I can never flatter my felf with the Hopes of being dear to him. Here my Sighs and Tears made me perfectly asham'd, and I was as mad at my own Senfibility, as at his Indifferency; but had I known what was passing between him and my Sifter, I shou'd have had as much reason to be pleas'd, as I thought I had for the contrary.

In fine, Madam, after a Conversation that turn'd on different Subjects, Don Ramire, urged by the Violence of his Pain, deliver d his Thoughts to her in the following Manner: Charming Mathilda ! I must intrust you with a Secret, on which depends the Peace of my Life; be pleas'd to hear me, and let me find in you those generous Dispositions, that may contribute to my future Happinefs. As fhe believed he was going to disclose a Secret to her, wherein she was chiesly concern'd, she thought fit to keep him under fuch a Restri-Ation, as not to allow him too much Liberty. N You

You ought, Sir, answer'd she, to discover your Pain to a Perfon of more Wit than me ; I have not Experience enough to give you any Advice, and there are certain Things I do not desire to know. Be assur'd, Madam, interrupted he, I have too great a Respect for you, to fay any thing that cou'd give you the least displeasure; moreover, you have nothing to fear, fince you are not interested in this Affair. I am only going to tell you, I have a Paffion for Inea, whom I adore; I hope my Succefs from your good Offices, and conjure you to grant me your Favour in this Requeft. In finishing these Words, he flung himself at her Feet, and his Thoughts were fo entirely taken up with what he was faying, that he took no notice of the different Emotions, which appear'd in her Looks. All, that Rage, Shame, and exceffive Love cou'd make one feel, join'd at once, to torment her. You love my Sifter, (faid she, after being fome time filent,) and you chufe me for your Confident, without confidering, that as I am the eldeft, my For-tune must be settled, before hers: I am so of-fended at the Injury you do me, that were I more revengeful than I am, I wou'd instantly punish your Indifferency. Go, Sir, continu'd she, speak to her your felf; I shou'd render you but a very ill Office ; with that the left him, and no Man was ever feen in a greater Confusion. He walk'd fome time in the Ally, reflecting on what had pass'd, and was now convinc'd, Mathilda, having difcover'd her Weak-

Weaknefs to him, wou'd leave no Art unpractis'd to difappoint his Passion for me.

Don Ramire, perplex'd with these Thoughts, came into the Arbour, where I told you, Madam, I had retir'd, and was not a little fur-priz'd to find me there. As for my Part, I knew not what Refolution to take, whether to go, or flay, when he put himself on his Knees by me, and intreating me to hear him, Adorable Inea, faid he, the Condition I am reducid to, does not permit me to be any longer filent. I cannot doubt of your Averfion, fince you not only debar me of your Conversation, but even turn your Eyes from me. I have us'd all possible Means to decline a Paffion, which I fear will difpleafe you : But as the Torment I endure is little inferior to Death, whatever Ufage I am to receive from you hereafter, only think, I daily die for you. I cou'd not imagine, Don Ramire, (reply'd I) you were fo capable of Deceit, but your Conduct convinces me of the Truth. You try in vain to perfwade me. This Diffimulation is worfe than the Offence, and I know what I am to depend on. Go, Sir, I am refolv'd never to fee you, nor fpeak to you more. Ending thefe Words, I ran from him, in spight of his Endeavours to prevent me, and left him with an Air, fo full of Pride and Anger, that he told me fince, he had like to have expired on the Place. His Despair was fo great, that (being retired to his Chamber) he was taken ill with a violent Feaver, which oblig'd him to N 2 . keep his Bed. The

The mean while I went into my Clofet, where being alone, I abandon'd my felf to a thousand cruel Reflections. Were I only to contend with Mathilda, thought I, there wou'd still be hopes of obtaining fome Advantage over her; but the Cafe now is fuch, that shou'd Don Ramire yield his Heart to me, methinks I wou'd reject the Offer. He is a Tray-tor, who tells me, he has Sentiments for me, which he has not. He fays the fame to my Sifter, and loves neither of us; at least I have caufe to complain, fince he chufes me for the Subject of his Raillery. Oh ! what Fatality deludes me, to love this perfidious Man? I fear he knows the Affection I have for him, which is a Misfortune, I cannot bear. Thefe Thoughts forc'd a Flood of Tears from my Eyes, whilft I endeavour'd to banish him from my Heart ; and I was thus deprefs'd with Sorrow, when my Mother fent for me: I went down to her Apartment, and appear'd fo de-jected, that my Sifter (who examin'd every Motion of me) did not doubt, but I was come from Don Ramire's Chamber, and that his Ill-nefs was the Occafion of my Melancholy; tho' at the fame time, I knew nothing of the Matter, nor wou'd I enquire after him, thinking he did not deferve fo great a Favour, therefore I return'd to my own Chamber again, without hearing his Name once mention'd.

Mathilda perfifting in her Love for Don Ramire, told my Mother the Conversation they had together in the Garden, and defir'd, she wou'd wou'd be favourable to her, in laying her Commands on me, to use him with fo much Indifference, as might deftroy his Hopes of ever attaining to my Affection. This, my Mother promis'd her, and all fhe cou'd with on that Subject. The next Day, I heard the Condition he was in, who little thought, I had the least Concern for his Illness, tho' I must confefs, it gave me much Uneafinefs, and Compaffion foon took place of my Anger ; yet I wou'd not go to fee him, whatever Pain I fuffer'd, in denying my felf that Satisfaction.

Ah! how great is my Misfortune, cry'd I, not to have Pride enough to fupprefs a Paffion, which fo immoderately difturbs my Mind, and yet have fo much Refentment, as to deny my felf the only Pleafure this World can give me? How is it poffible, I can be fo cruel to a Perfon, whole Idea is never absent from me, and whofe Life I-wou'd purchafe with my own ?

By this time, his Feaver was fo violent, that the Phyficians were of Opinion, nothing but his Youth cou'd fave him. I was in my Mother's Apartment, when they came to acquaint her with the Danger he was in, faying, they believ'd him very near leaving the World. At this News, I was fo feiz'd with Grief, that all I cou'd do, was to reach my Chamber, where I fell in a Swoon, and continu'd fo almost an Hour.

I had with me a young Servant, called Te-reza, who lov'd me entirely; and as the was no Stranger to my Affection for Don Ramire, the N 3 help'd help'd me to conceal the Defpair I was in. No, cry'd I, (when I was a little recover'd,) I cannot let him die, spite of his Ingratitude : I find the Prefervation of my Life depends on his. Heavens, (continu'd I, bath'd in Tears) shorten my Days, and give Health to Don Ramire ; for alas, without him, what can I expect, but unconceivable Pain? I proteft to you, Madam, I faid a thousand distracted Things, the Recital of which, wou'd tire you; for fure, no Sorrow was ever equal to mine, I was thus tormenting my felf, when my Mother came into my Chamber, and her Prefence fo furpriz'd me, that I had like to have related to her the Subject of my Grief. She had just been with Don Ramire, who conjured her in a most prefling Manner, to let me favour him with a Visit; adding, that after fo great a Satisfaction, he shou'd contentedly die : She told him, any thing he defired fhou'd be granted, then came to prepare me for this Interview, telling me how I shou'd behave my felf, Don Ramire, faid fhe, is fo near Death, that what I am going to enjoyn you, I believe, is unneceffary; yet that I may have no, Cause to reproach my self, I command you, Inea, to flow him all the Indifferency possible, in case he speaks to you of his Paffion. I shall obey your Orders with Pleafure, Madam, reply'd I, tho' I am perfuaded, if he intended an Alliance in this Family, he never had a Thought of me. You make an unfeafonable, Declaration (interrupted my Mother, in a fevere Tone) for I know he loves you to Diffraction, and it was very imprudent in him, to chufe your Sifter for a Confident; as being your eldeft, fhe ought first to be provided for; befides, it's my Will, pray tell Don Ramire fo, and that I had rather fee you dead, than his Wife.

My Mother fpoke to me with fo much Heat, that I cou'd not difpute the Truth of what the faid. I prefently comprehended her Meaning, and instead of a Traytor, as I thought him before, I now found he was a Man of Honour, and the conftantest of Lovers. This no ways foften'd my Pain; for tho' I was overjoy'd to know his Passion was fincere, yet on the other hand, I faw my felf at the point of losing a Person, I then esteem'd worthy the Sentiments I had for him; and my Alarms continually perfuaded me, nothing cou'd mitigate fo real a Misfortune. The Impatience I had to fee him, wou'd not permit me to fay much to my Mother. I left her, and took Tereza with me to Don Ramire's Apartment, which I had hardly enter'd, and approach'd his Bed, when he turn'd himfelf towards me, and reaching out his Hand, faid in a weak Voice; Come, Madam, come and receive the last Breath of a Man, who never figh'd for any one but you; tho' your Injustice accus'd my Heart with Deceit. The State you fee me in, ought to convince you, there never was a Paffion more perfect. It's for you I die, adorable Inea, (con-tinued he, preffing my Hand,) it's you alone, who N_4 who is the Caufe; and fince it was my Fate, not to deferve your Effecm, I think my felf happy not to furvive your Aversion. In finish-ing these Words, he look'd at me with Eyes drown'd in Tears, and fell into a deep Silence, which I did not presently interrupt, being either in Diforder, or pleas d to hear him mention a Paffion, I began to believe, and was willing to approve. At last I spoke to him; Cease to reproach me, Don Ramire, faid I; ceafe to complain, and think only of recovering; I am unfortunate enough already, and did not want this last Stroke to compleat my Ruin Must I lay aside the Modestry of my Sex, and in spite of Shame, confess I love you? Oh! consider what a Sacrifice I make you, when I own those Sentiments, I have fo long endeavour'd to conceal. I thought you had an Inclination for my Sifter, which gave me much Uneafinefs; all your Civilities to her, I us'd to attribute to Love; and what very much increas'd my Torment, was the Action you did fome Days ago, when you flung your felf on your Knees before her in the Garden. I concluded, you were entertaining her with your Paffion, which made me retire to the Arbour, where you found me, in order to indulge my Grief; that was the Caufe of my upbraiding you; but now, Sir, you may be fatisfy'd; for I have punifh'd my felf feverely, and you are fufficiently reveng'd. In finifhing thefe Words, I burft out in Tears, and this Gentleman, who before cou'd fearcely fpeak, speak, cry'd aloud, with Transports of excesfive Joy, Ah charming Inea! why was my Happiness fo long unknown to me? I was just going with my Despair to end my Life; but fince you have deliver'd me from the Arms of Death, I am refolv'd to live, and live to ferve you alone. Here I interrupted him, to acquaint him with my Mother's Intentions, which he protefted, he never wou'd comply with. I reprefented to him the Necessity there was to affect an Inclination for Mathilda, in order to carry on our Amour the more fuccefsfully. He told me his Honour wou'd not fuffer him to act fuch a Part, and that he thought it more prudent, to speak directly to my Father concerning our Marriage; but as I knew my Mother's jealous Humour, I was fatisfy'd fuch a Conduct wou'd highly offend her, and that no Scheme wou'd fucceed fo well, as a feign'd Paffion for my Sifter; which Opinion I, at last perfuaded him to approve.

I cannot deny you any thing, Madam, faid he, fince my Life is your's. Difpofe of my Deftiny as you pleafe, I am devoted to your Commands. In fhort, Don Ramire promis'd me to make his Addreffes to my Sifter in fuch a Manner, as might incline her to believe he defign'd to marry her. As foon as I left his Chamber, I went to my Mother, and told her, what he faid on that Point, which pleas'd her extremely; and as for my Sifter, nothing could equal the Joy fhe express'd, at fo agreeable a Change,

We

185

- We us'd every Day to visit Don Ramire, during his Illnefs, and whenever I was alone with Mathilda, I constrain'd my felf to exaggerate the Affection he had for her, which I really repeated fo often, that fometimes I was afraid I fpoke the Truth, Thus we manag'd Affairs till he recover'd; and my Family looked upon him as Mathilda's Votary. About this Time, the Governour of Porto Real, (whofe Daughter had been newly marry'd) gave an Entertainment, with a Ball at Night, to all the Nobility of that Place. We were invited to this Affembly, which was much greater than any we had ever appear'd at before. Don Ramire, who was to be of the Party, express'd fome Uneafinefs at my going thither, fearing my Charms, as he told me, wou'd create him many Rivals. Indeed, tho' I had no extraordinary Conceit of my felf, I cou'd not condemn his Jealoufy, but rather approv'd it, and thought I had Reafon to return him the fame Compliment. We faid a great deal on that Subject, till at laft, I took it into my Head not to go there at all, and was meditating on fome Stratagem to favour my Delign, when my Mother fent to let me know, fhe was ready, and only waited for me. I immediately went 'to her, but first made Don Ra-mire promise me, whatever happen'd he wou'd not leave the Ball, till he faw my Mother and Sister Home again.

We all went together to the Governour's ; Don Ramire gave his Hand to my Mother, who

who was follow'd by my Sifter; and as for my part, juft as I ftep'd out of the Coach, I defignedly fell down, and pretended I had fprain'd my Foot, fo that I cou'd not appear at the Ball. My Mother (difpleas'd at this Accident, which fhe did not know to be a Counterfeit,) fent me Home, and Don Ramire ftay'd with them, very much furpriz'd at what I had done, being fenfible, it was a Sacrifice I made him; he had not Refolution enough to ftay by Mathilda, during all the Entertainment, but took an Opportunity, whilf fhe was dancing, to go and place himfelf in 'a Corner of the Room, and there wrote to this Effect on his Tablets.

WHAT Torment does your Absence give me, adorable Inca? Here you leave me, exposed to the Smiles of a Woman I hate. How do you think it possible for me to be complaifant to your Sister, when you are not by? As soon as you were gone, my Thoughts like your Shadow, follow'd you. Alas, this Moment, absent from you, Who is more unbappy than I? And how fortunate shou'd I think my self, were I paying Homage to your beauteous Eyes?

Mathilda (who was naturally uneafy) not feeing. Don Ramire by her, look'd every where for him, and at laft perceiv'd him Writing on his Tablets: She went and took him out to dance the Sarao, which you know, Madam, was invented by the Moors; every Cavalier leads his Lady Lady with one Hand, and carries a Torch in the other. My Sifter, as fhe was dancing, found it eafy enough to take his Tablets away, unknown to him. The Dance being ended, fhe went afide, in order to examine them. You may eafily judge, at reading what was wrote in 'em, how enrag'd fhe was, to find her felf thus betray'd, and the Preference given to me; having fo good an Opinion of her own Merit, as to believe, it wou'd have infured her from this Misfortune.-

Nothing cou'd be equal to the violent Paffion she was in; yet during the Ball, she en-deavour'd to conceal it; and what help'd her most to dissemble, was, that (to do her Juflice) as the is very amiable, Don Sanche of Gusman, Son to the Governour, who was a fine Gentleman, but extremely vain, addrefs'd himfelf particularly to her, and fhe thought, fhe cou'd not have a better Opportunity to cure her Passion, and be reveng'd of Don Ramire, than giving a favourable Reception to this Cayalier; therefore, fhe immediately gave him to understand, my Mother wou'd be willing he fhou'd vifit us: Altho' we are not fond of Company, faid she, yet, Sir, your distinguish'd Birth and Merit intitle you to a Privilege, others cannot pretend to. This Invitation highly pleas'd him, inafmuch as he had already declar'd his Paffion for my Sifter, and çou'd not well expect a Return, unless he were admitted to pay his Devoirs to her.

Constant for the second

Mai

Mathilda prepar'd my Mother to receive him, but did not mention the Adventure of the Tablets; fhe only told her, that as fhe was not very fure of Don Ramire's Heart, a Rival might give him fome Jealoufy, and induce him to conclude a Marriage, he daily feem'd to decline. While fhe was fludying Means to fatisfy her Revenge, Don Ramire acquainted me with the Lofs of his Tablets, which he fear'd were fallen into the Hands of my Sifter: Tho' I take little Notice of her Behaviour towards me, faid he, I observe within thefe few Days, fhe treats me with an affected Civility. I cannot well penetrate into the Caufe, nor shou'd be any ways uneafy about it, only I apprehend, she is inform'd of what we had agreed fhou'd be kept fecret : If you will give me Leave, continu'd he, to declare my Passion to your Father, we shall foon know what to depend on.

I must confess, Madam, the only Motive I had to make a Mystery of it, was the Pleafure of being fecretly belov'd by a Man, whom I esteem'd fo worthy my Affection; therefore I defired he would stay fome Time longer, before he discovered his Sentiments.

Confider, Don Ramire, faid I, that our Condition is not fo unhappy, as you imagine. We live together in the fame Houfe, and in Spite of the jealous Eyes, which continually obferve us, we fee one another every Day, and our Love is mutual. Such as these were our daily Conversations, when we perceiv'd by Don Sanche's affiduous Courtship to my Sister, that his Passion for her had received a new Addition. We thought she treated him with fo much Distinction, as perfwaded us he wou'd foon be happy in her Favour, which extremely overjoy'd us, for we waited nothing elfe to perfect our Felicity. How blefs'd will be my Days, faid Don Ramire to me, when without Opposition, I shall posses those Excellencies, I now adore? Ah! dear Inea, does your Heart fympathize with mine, and may I hope to find in you those Endearments, which none but tender Lovers can truly reliss? If once I am fo fortunate, as to obtain that Wish, continued he, no Thought of any other Happiness (for fure there can be none) shall ever dwell in this Bofom. My Vows shall be dedicated to you alone, and the Height of my Ambition will only be to merit your Love.

Alas, Madam! you may imagine, thefe obliging Affurances from a Man, I fo entirely loved, made the Days pafs like Hours; but will you believe, that while we were expecting the Conclusion of my Sister's Marriage with Don Sanche, her Jealoufy increas'd to fuch a Degree, that it wou'd not give her a Moment's Peace. She was more taken up with the Thoughts of Revenge, than with the Care of pleasing a Person, who was proposing to her fo advantageous an Alliance. I heard that one Day, Don Sanche having defired Leave Leave to fpeak to his Father about it, fhe fuddenly chang'd Colour, and her Eyes express'd a more than ordinary Grief: I can no longer be filent, faid she to him, in a Cause, wherein you are interested; fince you confess a Passion for me, and feem willing to unite your Deftiny with mine; let me tell you, Sir, you must first destroy the Hopes of a Rival, to whom I am already engag'd. Don Ramire has obtained the Confent of my Family, and impatiently expects an Answer from his, to terminate every Thing. Before I faw you, I was not a-verfed to him; but alas, I cannot now think of my Fate, without Horror. I do not doubt, but your Love and Courage united will releafe me from this Engagement, fince nothing, except my Inclination for you, cou'd induce me to decline it. Here her malicious Tears interrupted her Difcourfe, and by this Stratagem, Don Sanche was eafily perfwaded to undertake any desperate Thing against Don Ra-mire. He assured her, he wou'd soon make him renounce his Pretensions to her, if he had Affurance enough to oppose him in a Place, where his Authority was great, and in an Affair, where his Heart was fo particularly concern'd; adding to these Words, all that Love cou'd infpire.

This made Mathilda believe, Don Ramire wou'd rather yield her up, than engage in her Quarrel, or that if he anfwer'd the Challenge, out of a Point of Honour, he wou'd have a potent Enemy to contend with. She muft have have been very revengeful, to enter into a Sentiment fo opposite to those of her Sex; for she imprudently exposed at once two Persons, who were very dear to her. Don Sanche impatient to come to a Decision with Don Ramire, writ to him that Night, in Terms which show'd an insupportable Pride. He thus addrefs'd him.

THE Paffion I have for Mathilda, will not admit of a Rival. I am inform'd you are mine, tho' it little concerns me: Tou know who I am, and that you will be difappointed in contending with me; therefore I advise you to be secret in this Affair, and generously yield a Pretension, you cannot dispute without Rashness.

Don Ramire, was highly provok'd at readind this haughty Billet; and tho' he knew it was a Plot of my Sister's, yet he wou'd not let me into his Resolutions, fearing I might oppose 'em; but immediately return'd Don Sanche an Answer, in these Terms.

THE Indifference I have for Mathilda, cou'd not have engag'd me to dispute her Heart with any one, but your self. It's sufficient you admire her, for me to oppose your Pretensions; and in Return to your Liberty with me, I advise you never to see her more, unles you intend, with your Life, to satisfy my Resentment.

As Don Ramire believ'd, fo violent a Beginning wou'd have a fuitable Confequence, he went the next Day to a Place, where he thought he might meet him, (as he effectually did.) Don Sanche no fooner perceiv'd him, but came up, and faid in a low Voice, without the leaft Affectation; Well, Sir, are you difpos'd to meafure your Sword with mine? I am difpos'd to punifh your Infolence, reply'd Don Ramire, and fhall expect you on the Strand by the Sea-Side, where no Body may prevent us. They feparated on this, and Don Ramire went to the appointed Place.

He was hardly there, when he faw Don Sanche coming up to him with menacing Looks. They both immediately drew, and made feveral Paffes at each other : Don Ramire parry'd those of his Enemy, and soon put him in fome Diforder, till at laft, he gave him a mortal Wound, which hardly left him Life enough to confess the Author of his Fate. As for Don Ramire, he returned Home, with fo much Serenity in his Countenance, that it was to be admir'd : He did not even think of taking the leaft Care of his Safety, and feem'd as if some fecret Charm detain'd him. Alas! I am perfwaded, that fatal Charm was my felf. He spoke to me with a Freedom, I cou'd not attribute to any thing, but the Greatness of his Soul; and I had no Room to fuspect the Misfortune, which had just happened to him, when of a fudden, the Governour and his Guards. Guards, furrounded my Father's Houfe, and fnatch'd him from my Arms, in Spite of all I cou'd do to oppofe 'em. Thofe Moments I cannot call to mind, with-

Those Moments I cannot call to mind, without the greatest Concern. The Governour, who was perfectly distracted, as well as inconfolable for the Loss of his only Son, came himself, on purpose to facrifice Don Ramire to his Refentment. I do not at all doubt, but as he was seconded by a firong Guard, he wou'd have kill'd my Lover before my Face, had not I prevented him by ftanding between 'em, and to fave him, expos'd my felf to all the Danger; for tho' I am naturally so timerous, that even the Sight of a drawn Sword strikes me with Terror, yet I assure you, Madam, on that Occasion, I behav'd my felf with fo much Resources, to be in Love.

Don Ramire, who faw with the utmost Defpair, the Danger which threatened me, was like a Lyon, defending himfelf against a Company of eager Huntsmen; he wounded some, and avoided the Fury of others; but alas, his Courage, and the little Affistance I cou'd afford him, did not hinder them from feizing, and carrying him immediately to Prison.

I thought at that Time, my Soul wou'd have departed from its Habitation, my Blood turn'd fo cold in my Veins. I would have follow'd Don Ramire, and fhar'd his Misfortunes, had not my Mother and Sifter prevented me. Mathilda, more like a Fury, than a reafonable Crea-

Creature, loaded me with Imprecations and Reproaches. The Death of Don Ramire, faid the, thall revenge me, as well as the Perfon whofe Fate I deplore. The Traitor thall be a Sacrifice to the Governour's just Refentment, and my Heart can receive no real Pleafure, till the Day comes, that he is to lofe his Life. The Violence of my Grief wou'd not permit me to make any Anfwer; my Eyes faid enough, and I have well experienc'd, that exceffive Affliction makes every Thing, but its Caufe, indifferent to us.

Who can reprefent, the Torture I lay in, all that Night? As foon as it was Day, I fent to fome of Don Ramire's Friends, defiring they wou'd acquaint me with what they knew concerning his Fate. I was then inform'd, he had been examined, and the partial Judgment of the Court had already condemn'd him, the Governour being refolv'd, not to fhow him the leaft Favour; but as there was a Form to be obferved in the Tryal, they had permitted an Acquaintance of his, whofe Name was Don Tiello, to plead in Defence of his Life.

Far from finking under this Misfortune, I receiv'd new Strength from its Extremity: It is no Time now to fhed Tears, cry'd I; the Safety of my Lover, is what I muft think on. Terefa, continued I, you were ever faithful to me, and are the only Perfon, in whom I can confide; go, run, and buy me a Suit of Mens Cloaths, for I am refolv'd to fee Don Ramire: I can pretend I am Son to Don Tiello, who O 2 196

fends me to inform him of what is paffing in his Affair, and by that Means I fhall be admitted to enter the Prifon, where we may take Meafures together for his Efcape. Ah, Madam, take Care what you do, reply'd fhe; if you are known, what will become of you? I am not in a Condition, faid I, that will permit me to apprehend any thing. We muft endeavour to fnatch Don Ramire from the Governour's Revenge, and when he is fafe, I fhall have Time enough to think on what relates to me. In ending thefe Words, I obliged her to get me the Cloaths, which I immediately put on, and fancy'd in that Drefs I might very well pafs for a young Cavalier. Night being come, I ordered Terefa to take Night being come, I ordered Terefa to take the Key of my Chamber, and give out I was ill in Bed; then went out in this Difguife, protected by none but my Guardian Angels. If by Misfortune, faid I, Don Tiello, (who has generoufly offer'd to defend Don Ramire,) fhou'd be with him, or perhaps come in, whilft I am there, what muft I do, and how fhall I extricate my felf from fuch a Difficulty? Love, faid I! oh Love, for whom I fuffer unconceivable Torments, be favourable to me this time! you fee my deep Concern for the Danger, which threatens my Lover; I have little Hopes, and every Thing to fear, unlefs his Safety becomes your Care.

When I was arriv'd at this fatal Prifon, I hardly had Strength to fupport me; my Spirits were feeble, and I found my felf in much Dif-

Diforder. The first Person I spoke to, was the Jaylor's Daughter; I told her, I was Don Tiello's Son, Friend to Don Ramire, and was come to inform him of the State of his Affairs. At these Words, she press'd my Hand, like a Perfon in fome Concern, and faid, Ah, Sir, the unhappy Gentleman is loft, if you do not take speedy Measures to fave him. I know more of that Matter than you, continued fhe, and perhaps interest my felf as much. The Place we were in, was fo dark, that I cou'd not fee her Face, tho' I had a great Curiofity to know the Perfon who express'd her felf fo feelingly; but I faid in a trembling Voice, pray tell me, what you have heard concerning him. All the Judges, reply'd fhe, are devoted to the Governour, and Don Ramire will be condemn'd without Appeal; I have endeavoured in vain to find an Opportunity of fpeaking to to him, but never cou'd fee him, fince he was brought here, cover'd with Blood and Duft; and in that difmal Condition, he appear'd to me the handfomeft Man, I had ever feen. Alas, how fatal was that Sight to me? I was fo touch'd with his Misfortune, that all my Thoughts ever fince have been employ'd on his Safety, and I am happy enough to have found an Expedient, which cannot fail.

Here she was filent, but after a little Pause, affum'd her Discourse ; and since you are his Friend, continued she, I ought not to conceal from you, the Disposition I have for him; I must Q'3 must confess I love him, and my Affection is rais'd to fuch a Degree, that I am refolv'd to deliver him from hence, if in giving him his Life, he will dedicate the Remainder of it to me, and render my Fate inseparable from his. Tell him, how near the Danger is, fince he will not have common Mercy flown him, and that if he can purchafe his Life on thefe Terms, I am ready to ferve him: I know he is a Man of Quality, and the vaft Difproportion there is between us; but the Condition, I hope, will make me acceptable to him : I shall for his fake, expose my Family to the Governour's Refentment, who will believe my Father contriv'd his Efcape, and perhaps, punish him accordingly. How often have I faid to my felf, Laurea! unfortunate Laurea! cease attempting a Happihas my Paffion for a Stranger, Power enough to make me forfake my Parents? Alas, Sir, I have difputed with my felf, till I am no longer Mistress of my Reason; I cou'd facrifice every thing for him; he is dearer to me than Life, and the Danger he is in, affects me be-yond Imagination. Affure him from me, that my Heart never receiv'd an Impression before. I am young, and tho' not beautiful, may pass for agreeable. Oh! how happy fhou'd I think my felf, if he did but like me? And cou'd his Paffion proceed more from Inclination than Gratitude, I shou'd die transported : Yet, said she to me, as you are particularly acquainted with him, pray tell me, whether he is not already engaged; for in fine, as I do every thing for him, I alfo expect, he will make me an equal Return; therefore, go to him, I fhall wair your Anfwer here, in order to undertake fomething in his Favour.

Tho' my Heart was fo contracted with Grief, that I cou'd hardly answer her, after the had ceas'd speaking, I faid to her, Madam, your Defign in preferving a Gentleman, fo deferving of Life, is truly generous. I am perfwaded, he will not be ungrateful, and shall let you know his Sentiments, when I return. She left me immediately to tell her Father, I was Don Tiello's Son, who defired to fee Don Ramire. He made no Difficulty, but conducted me to the Place, where this unhappy Gentleman was fhut up : Alas, Madam, where thall I find Words to exprets the Anguifh and Trouble I felt at that Inftant? What am I going to do, and what Advice shall I give him? faid I. Must I deliver him up to my Rival? No, I cannot bear the Thought of it. He shall never know the Passion she has for him; then reproaching my felf, for coming to fuch a Refolution; What, continued I! wou'd I thus fee him perifh, and deliver him up to the Fury of his Enemies? Oh! fure, I cannot be guilty of fo much Cruelty, for rather than let him die, he shall be hers : I will with my own Hand give him to her, and fince I am deftin'd to be a Sacrifice, my Peace and Liberty thall be the Ranfom of his Prefervation.

Thus

Thus, Madam, I came to the Chamber where Don Ramire was confin'd, and being let in, the Doors were fhut again. He was fo extremely thoughtful, that he hardly turn'd his Eyes towards me, till I fpoke to him; What makes you fo difpirited, Sir ? faid I: Where is that Courage, which ever fupported you? The Tone of my Voice, made me known to him, and opening his Arms; Oh, my Angel! cry'd he, the only dear Object of my Vows; Is it you I fee here, in this frightful Prifon? Are you come to fhare my Pains? At these Words, he took hold of my Hand, and kifs'd it with Transports of the greatest Passion. I fat down, by him, and was fome Time, before I cou'd recover my Speech, fo many difmal Thoughts conspir'd to increase my Despair; at last, I made an Effort, and faid, if you knew, my dear Don Ramire, what is contriving against you, my Presence wou'd not give you all this Joy. They are working your Ruin, and you cannot poliibly avoid the Misfortune, you are threatened with, but by Marrying Laurea, the Jaylor's Daughter, who is in Love with you, and will do her utmost to fave you. The Drefs I am in deceiv'd her, and fhe has confess'd her Passion for you; she charg'd me to inform you of it, and requires your Anfwer, affuring me at the fame Time, you will have nothing to fear, if once you confent to her Wifhes ; I conjure you then, by all our Affe-ction, to embrace this important Occasion : Marry her, fince there is no other Remedy left: I had rather deplore the Lofs of your Heart, than that of your Life. O fatal Refolution! added I, must I even lose the Hopes of ever being yours? But alas, what do I fay? It is no time now to reflect. I cannot ballance your Interest with mine. You must live, Sir, tho' you live for another: Whilst unhappy Inea, (retired to fome remote folitary Place) will be dead to you, and to the rest of the World.

Don Ramire heard me with Surprize, and made me this Reply; Do you think, Madam, I shall not always prefer Death. to an inglorious Life, and that I am capable of making you the Sacrifice ? No, unfortunate as I am, Love and Refolution are my Companions, and nothing shall ever make me change. Here, I cou'd not restrain my Tears, which he perceived, and faid, cease weeping, my dear Inea; Why will you add to my Calamities ? Oh! rather conceal your Trouble, fince it is in vain to advife me to fuch an Alliance. Must I speak to' you no more of it? (reply'd I, fighing) Are you then refolv'd on your Death, and mine, and will your Love and Courage, be of no other Help to you, than to let you fall a Victim to an incens'd Parent, whose only Son, you have destroyed? At least, strive to fave your felf; promife every thing to Laurea, and perform what you pleafe. You know me very little, Madam, interrupted he, if you believe, I can be fo perfidious: This young Creature will depend on my Assurances, and I cannot refolve to deceive her. Heavens! What Cont I hall fhall we do then ? cry'd I : Your tender Scruples, are very ill timed; Do you confider, how near you are the Danger, which threatens you, and that your Fate is almost inevitable? I beg of you, I conjure you to comply with Laurea, tho' you are dearer to me than Life. Alas! if I faw the least Ray of Hope, do you think, I wou'd defire you to act fo contrary to my Peace? Oh my Dear! my eternal Love! continu'd I; don't factifice your felf to our mutual Affection, but yield to my last and earnest Request.

A Deluge of Tears follow'd thefe Words, and my Spirits were fo faint, that I cou'd hardly continue my Difcourfe. Ah! how fatal will your Pity be to me, cry'd he? Your Trouble pierces my Heart. Don't be fo dejected, charming Inea, Heaven will take care of us. Yes, faid I, Heaven wou'd take care of us indeed, if you did but fecond its Infpirations. Has not Providence fent you Laurea? Oh ! name her not, reply'd he ; I conjure you, by all the Powers of Love, never to mention her more. You are refolv'd to perish then, faid I. I wou'd live for you, answer'd he, but if it be not possible, I will at least die constant, and be fatisfy'd with giving you the last Proof of my Fidelity. Here in a deep Silence, he embrac'd my Knees, and moiften'd my Hands with his Tears, which gave a new Courfe to mine. My Breast, was fill'd with Grief, and in this fad Moment a Thought came into my Head, which I fancy'd might be executed without much Difficulty. Don't Don't be against all the Ways there are left Don't be against all the Ways there are left to preferve your Life, faid I, but fwear by your Passion for me, that you will strictly fol-low the Advice, I am going to give you. It's unnecessary, you shou'd engage me by Oath, to obey you, reply'd he; you know I am de-yoted to your Commands, and tho' I cou'd not confent to deceive Laurea, you must not judge from thence, of what I am capable of doing for you. Well, faid I, you shall have nothing to fay to her; I will be with you a-bout this time to Morrow, and we must exbout this time to Morrow, and we must exchange Cloaths ; you shall go out in mine, and immediately repair to Don Tiello, who will have Notice of it : There are Veffels going out a Cruifing, and as you have Relations at the Court of Morocco, you may find an Oppor-tunity of going to a Place, where you will be out of the Power of your Enemies. What, Madam! cry'd he, and leave you here a Prifoner, in my room, exposid to the Fury of your Relations, and the Governour's Refentment. Must you be facrific'd for my Liberty ? ment. Mult you be factifie'd for my Liberty ? No, I had rather die before your Face. I am not base enough to resolve on any such thing. I see very well (faid I to him, in an angry Tone) that I must use all my Authority to make you obey me. Since you compel me to it, Sir, I command you to prepare your self to go off, in the manner I told you; I pro-test if you continue to be obstinate, I never will see you more, I retract the Promise I made you of being yours, and dispense you of of

of all your Vows to me; fo that now being free, we may difpose as we please of our Destinies.

Never was Man in a greater Confusion, than poor Don Ramire, when he heard me utter these Words, he flung himself at my Feet, and look'd like one diffracted: Are you then refolv'd, Madam, to hate me, and make another Man happy? faid he; what Crime have I committed to deferve fo many Misfortunes? I only refuse to fly this Prison, because I wou'd not leave you here; fure this Proof of my Paffion cannot be fo cruel an Offence ? Why will you add one Torment to another ? I must be abfolutely obey'd, reply'd I, fince in leaving me here, I run no Rifque; Laurea will get me out, and it's with her, I shall take Measures for that Purpofe; therefore if you love me, do not oppose my setting you free. Alas, Madifpofe of me as you please (faid dam! he in a dejected Manner) I am wholly yours, and never wou'd have difputed your Power, were it not for the fear I was in, of exposing you to inevitable Dangers. I am now fatisfy'd, answer'd I; for be assur'd Don Ramire, if I. lov'd you lefs, I fhou'd not have been fo difpleas'd with your Refufal : At these Words he paffionately kifs'd my Hand, and with tender Regret we feparated.

The Jaylor being told by a Soldier of the Guard, that I wanted to have the Door open'd, came and conducted me out, but I was uneafy, not feeing Laurea, who (having veil'd her felf) was was standing in a dark Passage near the outward Gate, where on a fudden I heard her fay, Hold, Sir, pray let me know what News from the Perfon you have just feen; he acknow-ledges your Generofity with the highest Gratitude, Madam, faid I, and will make you Mistrefs of his Fate, being refolv'd to live only for you. I fear you flatter me, reply'd fhe, for I am easily deceiv'd, but if you do, Heaven will punish you both. No, faid I, do not suspect his Honour, nor mine, you shall never have reason to repent your generous Sentiments, but when will you fet him free ? As foon as poffible, answer'd she; my Father, and the Soldiers who guard him cat together; I intend to put Opium in their Wine, and when they are alleep, steal the Keys, fo let him out. But what will become of us afterwards, continu'd Laurea? You shall embark together, faid I, and rejoyce at your good Fortune, far from Porto-Real; thus I left her, and the feem'd highly pleas'd at the Affurances I gave her.

I was going towards home, when I thought it very neceffary, Don Tiello fhou'd be inform'd of what had pafs'd; therefore I went to him, and told him I had us'd his Name to be admitted into the Prifon, which I hop'd he wou'd approve; that I had been trying Means for my Friend's Efcape, and as I did not doubt of fucceeding, we had agreed he fhou'd come to him as foon as he was free, being perfuaded he wou'd be fo generous, as to take care of his Safety, till he had found a Ship to carry him him to Morocco. The Circumstance is very lucky, faid he, for my Brother lies now in the Road, and only waits a fair Wind to fail for that Coast; be assured I shall neglect no Opportunity of serving him. After this Answer, I defir'd him not to go the next Day to the Prison, because I was to be there, and shou'd pass for his Son; so left him without being known, and my Mind was more compos'd, than it had been ever fince Don Rámirê's fatal Confinement.

By this time I was come home, where I found Terefa waiting for me. I related to her all that had paſs'd; but when I recollected, I had advis'd Don Ramire to lay his Liberty at Laurea's Feet, I thought, I cou'd never have been capable of acting fo contrary to my Sentiments. What cou'd I do Terefa, faid I, for were he as weak as I have been, and had Fear made him inconftant, by this time, I fhou'd fee him no longer mine; and on the other fide, had I not us'd this Stratagem, in a few Days he wou'd be no more in the World.

I found fome Eafe in entertaining her after this manner most part of the Night, and reprefenting to her his extraordinary Passion and Constancy, his Defign of going to Morocco, and mine of meeting him there. I ought not to distrust, faid I, the Promise he has given me, fince he declar'd he rather wou'd chuse Death, than be contracted to his Deliverer; and if I can get my Jewels (which are in my Mother's keeping) nothing shall prevent my making this Voyage.

Voyage. Terefa told me, it was easy enough to get into her Clofet, and if I wou'd carry her with me, she wou'd take upon her to get 'em, tho' fhe fhou'd hazard her Life for it. Her Affection to my Service fo fenfibly touch'd me, that I embrac'd her, and promis'd never to forfake her. You must go out with me to Morrow Night, continu'd I, difguis'd in Men's Cloaths, for fear my Relations (perceiving my Flight, and the Lofs of the Jewels) shou'd feize you; as Don Tiello is a Man of Honour, and in our Prisoner's Interest, I will meet him before I go to the Prison, and tell him my Resolution of ftaying in Don Ramire's Place; I fhall defire him at the fame to protect you, and procure us a Ship to follow him. But, Ma-dam, reply'd fhe, what will you do with *Lau*rea, whom you intend to deceive, under the Notion of your being Don Ramire? She will follow your Fortune, and if the difcovers who you are, may give you a great deal of Trouble. This requiring fome Reflection, every thing I had to fear, prefented it felf to my Imagination all that Night, and tormented me a thousand different Ways.

The next Morning I pretended I was extremely indifpos'd, to prevent my Mother's fufpecting I had any Defign; and as foon as it was Dusk of Evening, Terefa difguis'd, enter'd my Mother's Clofet, and took the Jewels, as we had propos'd it; then I went directly to the Prifon, where Laurea was expecting me, without any Light; I told her, I was refolv'd to expose my Life for her, and Don Ramire's Service, affuring her, I wou'd carry them to a Ship which wou'd foon put 'em out of the Power of their Enemies. My Fate is in your Hands, reply'd fhe, and provided I am with him I love, carry me where you please : I am now endeavouring his Liberty, and do not doubt, but I shall succeed in what I undertake. I return'd her Thanks in the Name of Don Ramire, then hiding my felf with my Cloke, went to the Jaylor, whom I complimented in few Words, and defired the Favour of feeing Don Ramire, as from my Father; you shall fee him this Night, and no more, (faid he to me, in a rough manner) for Orders are given, that none but Don Tiello shou'd be admitted, and if the Governour knew I fuffer you to fpeak to him, he wou'd make me repent it. This unexpected Reception ftun'd me : Alas! thought I, if we do not improve this Opportunity, we are all'undone.

Don Ramire, as foon as I enter'd his Chamber, receiv'd me in his Arms, and faluted me with fo much Tendernefs, in his Words and Actions, that it flow'd at once, his Love and Gratitude. Come, my Dear, faid I, let us make good ufe of this precious Moment; put on my Cloaths immediately, and give me yours; cover your Face after the fame manner, I did mine; and if you meet Laurea as you go out, tell her, Don Ramire depends entirely on her Friendfhip: Terefa (in whom I confide) is drefs'd in Mens Cloaths, and waits

at the end of a Street, to go along with you to Don Tiello's, who is ready to receive you; as for my part, I fhall ftay here, till Laurea comes to relieve me. Alas, my charming Inea, reply'd he, how fhall I refolve to forfake you? No, my only Dear, I cannot fubmit to a Command, fo defperate. If I must perish, or lose you, I readily prefer the first. Ah cruel Man! faid I, shall we then dispute for ever, and will you act both your own Destruction and mine? How can you be so obstinate? I beg you, dear Don Ramire, I conjure you, by all the Love you ever profess'd to me, and the Proofs I have given you of a Return, not to deny me this Favour; I fear every thing on your Account, but have little to fear on my own; obey me this Instant, and make no Reply.

Thus, Madam, I at last perfuaded him, tho' not without much Difficulty, and having divested my felf of my Clothes, I made him put em on. The Difguife feem'd favourable to him, and I was flattering my felf with a fuccefsful Event, when the Hour of parting drew near. Our Sighs and Tears, were the Interpreters of our excellive Grief. Is it pollible, I have Refolution enough, faid Don Ramire, to act a Part, fo contrary to the Sentiments of my Soul? Oh! think, that in obeying you this Day, I give you the greatest Testimony of an inviolable Passion. I regard it as a Proof of your Constancy, reply'd I, which will have its Reward; our Fortune may receive a happy Change, then we shall triumph over our ill Stars ; P

Stars

Stars; I even feel a fecret Satisfaction in my present Misfortune, fince it gives me an Opportunity of thowing, how much I love you. In what a different State is my bleeding Heart, cry'd he? Can I ever be more unhappy, than to leave you in this frightful Place, and live fome Days without you ? But, continued he, be affur'd, my Body only will be feparated from you; my Thoughts shall ever attend you; receive my Vows, divine Inea, and let this Ring be the Pledge of my Love ; Heaven ordain, we may be fo united, as never to be parted more. I accept your Hand, reply'd I; here, receive mine, and may the superior Powers be witnefs of our Promifes. Adieu, my Dear, (continued I, embracing him, and bath-ing his Face with my Tears.) Farewel my Angel, faid he, preffing me in his Arms, it grieves my very Soul to leave you.

Don Ramire, in this manner, was conducted out; and as foon as I had loft fight of him, all my Fears for him; and my own Conduct, came hurrying to my Mind. I know not, Madam, how it was poffible, I cou'd bear with the Anxiety of my Thoughts; all that was difinal, and full of Terror, enter'd my Imagination, whilft I was uncertain of his Fate; but by the time I thought he might be out of Danger, my afflicted Mind receiv'd fome Relief.

As I had pass'd but a very indifferent Night, I lay all the next Day on the Bed, which made the Jaylor believe I was fick; therefore whenever he came into my Chamber, he wou'd not interrupt interrupt me, but leaving what was neceffary by me, retired. I continued in this Situation, till the Evening, when I was agreeably fur-priz'd with a Vifit from Don Tiello, who brought me a Letter, and inform'd me of Don Ramire's being happily embark'd ; he highly commended the Refolution I had flown, in ftaying in his Place, with the hazard of my Life, to preferve his; but after he had been fome time with mc, he difcover'd, I was not what I appear'd to be; the Tone of my Voice, my Complexion, and particularly the Emotion I was in, when I fpoke of Don Ramire, with the Joy I express'd at receiving his Letter, and my Tears, every thing confirm'd his Suspici-ons; yet for fear of offending me; he wou'd not mention any thing of the Matter; pro-testing only, he wou'd do all, that depended on him to ferve me, and that I cou'd not confide in a Perfon, who wou'd make a more generous return. After some Discourses of this Nature, he took Leave of me, withing I might meet a Recompence, proportionable to fo great and perfect a Friendship. I pass'd the reft of my Night in reading over, and over, Don Ramire's Letter, which was the only Confolation I had, the five Days I was Prifoner; it was writ in these Terms, Cy ternelling

I Have left you, my dear Inca, in so frightful a Place, and with such melancholy Circumstances, that you may easily imagine, the Condition I am in, is not lefs deplorable than yours. I must con-P 2 fels, fefs, I was just on the Point of returning to you, but the Apprehension I was under, of displeasing. you, prevented my giving fuch a Proof of my Love. Ob ! ought I not to be alham'd you shou'd have furpass'd me in Generosity, and that I cou'd be weak enough to suffer it ? Tet do not interpret this to the Prejudice of One, who only confented to fly, that he might preserve himself yours; and fince our good Fortune equally depends on my Life, I shall take care of it, as an Offering, no longer mine, but consecrated to you. Come then speedily, my Angel, and let us by our Union, taste immortal Pleasures. My leaving this Place, is defer'd no longer than the finishing this Letter. I am going, and shall expect you with Impatience, pro-portionable to the Happiness of our next meeting : Adieu, my Soul, Adieu my only Dear; we shall have no Reason, I hope, to complain hereafter of Fortune, since our Passion Surpasses every thing, that has ever been known in the World.

I must tell you, Madam, I had taken Terefa with me to the Prifon, by which means I made her acquainted with Laurea, who fuppos'd her to be a young Gentleman, and our intimate Friend. As they us'd often to meet in a Place, they had appointed for that Purpofe, Laurea cou'd not help faying one Day to her, that she was very uneasly, concerning what she shou'd act in favour of Don Ramire, and that the had a mind to leave him in Confinement; for what can I hope from him? continu'd she; I may depend on a great deal of Chagrin on account count of my Father, who will be profecuted for his Escape : I shall be the occasion of the Ruin of my Family, and how do I know, but I may be loft with them. It's true, I am promis'd every thing from Don Ramire, yet my Birth is fo inferior to his, that nothing lefs than an extraordinary Passion, cou'd induce him to condefcend to our Alliance; befides, he has never feen me; and when we are once embark'd together, instead of loving me, per-haps he may hate me. Oh! I think my felf already abandon'd by him, and set assore on fome desert Island, where Death will be the Recompence of all my Pains. Terefa trembled at what the heard this young Creature fay, knowing I cou'd only make my Efcape by her means, fo omitted nothing to bring her back to her first Intentions. Generous Laurea, faid fhe, I am perfuaded, if you knew the Perfon you propose to serve, as well as I do, you wou'd never change your Resolution ; he has all the Sentiments of a Man of Honour, and I am fure, his Passion for you will be eternal : The Chimeras you frame to your felf, have not the least Foundation; I therefore conjure you, to be constant in so important a Cause, which will undoubtedly contribute to your good Fortune, as well as his. Laurea, asham'd of having shown fo much Inequality of Temper, made some Excuses, then resolv'd again on her first Design; I am willing to believe you, faid she, and to convince you of the Truth, be here exactly at Two after Midnight; I

I will bring Don Ramire to you; every thing is ready for his Efcape, and you may take Measures for our Departure. Teresa, extreamly overjoy'd at thefe Words, left her immediately, and went to Don Tiello to tell him, Don Ramire's Friend, whom he had feen in Prifon, wou'd be that Night fet free, and defired, he wou'd prepare a Sloop for their going off; bur, continued fhe, how shall we difengage our felves from Laurea, who will do us all the Prejudice in her Power, if once the perceives we have betray'd her. When the comes aboard, faid he, and finds it is not Don Ramire's Concern, fhe will be too happy to return home, without discovering any thing, for fear they flou'd charge her with having an Hand in his Escape ; and if some unforeseen Accident does not happen, I am perfuaded, we shall manage this Affair to our Satisfaction.

As I cou'd not tell, what Hour Laurea had appointed to fet me at Liberty, I began to be very much tired with my Confinement; but in the dead of Night, I was reliev'd of my Uneafinefs, when I heard my Door open foftly, and faw the Jaylor's Daughter; being wrap'd in my Cloak, I advanc'd towards her, with my Face almost hid, for fear she shou'd difcover I was not Don Ramire: I embrac'd her with the greatest Marks of a violent Passion, but faid little to her on the Score of my Gratirude; she was in such Diforder her felf, that I believe it wou'd have been hard for her, to perceive the Deceiv; had she even seen my Face.

Face. In one Hand the had a dark Lanthorn, and in the other a Bunch of Keys, fo without faying any thing to me, fhe made me a Sign to follow her, which I did, and we pafs'd all the Soldiers who were fast asleep, as she had contriv'd it, by putting Opium in their Wine. Thus we left the Place without the least Obstacle ; but as foon as we were in the Street, she took hold of my Arm, as if she were afraid I shou'd fly her, cling'd to me fo close, that I was hardly able to walk.

Don Tiello, and Terefa, were waiting for me in the Place they had appointed, from whence, we went together to the Sea-fide, where we found the Boat belonging to the Ship, which was to earry me to Morocco. The Night was very dark, and Laurea made me a thoufand Careffes, I cou'd but very ill return, being in pain to know, what wou'd become of this young Creature, after she had discover'd the Plot. We were not long a making up to the Veffel, and as foon as we came on board, Don Tiello carry'd us into the Captain's Cabbin; but, Madam, how shall I tell you the Surprize I was in, when I found this Captain to be my Father, who was no less aftonish'd to fee Terefa and me, after all the Enquiry that had been made about us throughout the whole City. Don Tiello, knowing he profess'd a great Friendship for Don Ramire, had trusted him with the Secret, and declar'd, I was that unhappy Gentleman's Miftrefs, who had refolv'd to follow his Fortune into Morocca, in in Man's Difguife; he flarted back three or four Steps, and not being Mafter of the firft Effects of his Pafilon, was going to draw his Sword, when I flung my felf at his Feet: Oh Sir! faid I, forgive me; remember you are my Father, and vouchfafe to hear, before you punifh me. I embrac'd his Knees, and wet his Hand with my Tears. Tho' he entirely lov'd me, yet in this Occafion, he fhow'd his Refentment, by making me many Reproaches, and at laft, bid me fay what I cou'd, to juftify my felf.

I knew my only Remedy was, to confess the Truth, which I did in fo feeling a Man-ner, that it mov'd his Compassion. He was very well acquainted with Don Ramire's Merit, and had been thoroughly concern'd for his Imprifonment ; but being inform'd of his Escape, he express'd an entire Satisfaction. My Father left us to go into another Cabbin with Don Tiello, who was very much his Friend. I fee, faid he, you are furpriz'd, as well as me, at what has happened; you were certainly a Stranger to Inea's Flight, and did not think, it was her you had put into my Hands. I proteft to you, reply'd Don Tiello, I am under a Consternation, which I cannot exprefs. I can't fay I have committed a Fault; for perhaps, it may turn to Advantage, that the Affair has pass'd after this Manner; but if you will make me perfectly eafy, I beg you will grant me your Daughter's Pardon, whatever Reafons you have to be difpleas'd with her.

her. You fee, she is contracted to Don Ramire, who is a Man of Birth and Fortune, and in my Opinion, you cannot difpofe of her better, than uniting her Destiny to his. I agree with you, reply'd my Father; but his Proceedings to obtain Inea, without my Confent, highly offend me. I receiv'd him into my Houfe as a particular Friend, and wou'd have willingly given my eldeft Daughter to him; was it nor a very ill Return, he made to fo much Civility, when he engag'd this young Creature to difguife her felf, and follow him like a Madwoman? If you remember what Inea has related to us, reply'd Don Tiello, she is alone culpable; yet of all Crimes, those which Love makes us commit, are most excuseable, and efpecially in a young Perfon, who has fo little Experience. Forgive her then, I conjure you, added he, and you will confer an Obligation on me, which I shall ever acknowledge. My Father, who was already difpos'd to favour me, embracing Don Tiello, faid to him, I am confiderably indebted to you, for enter-ing fo generously into the Interest of my Fa-mily, and will forget Inea's Crime, fince you desire it ; if Don Ramire has a real Passion for her, I shall rejoice at the Match; and as 'a Proof of my Satisfaction, I will carry her to Morrocco, in order to compleat their Happinefs.

This Conversation ended in my Favour, as you see, Madam, which I little expected; for I was in the Cabbin so extremely afflicted, that that I may fay, no Sorrow cou'd be equal to mine. What will become of me, (faid L to Terefa) I am for ever unfortunate ? I loofe my Liberty, in the very Moment, I thought my felf Miftrefs of my Deftiny, and I am now in the Power of a Father, who will have no Mercy of me. Alas! poor Don Ramire; I muft never fee him more; he will certainly think I am Dead, or Inconftant, and either of the Two will drive him into Defpair; I fhall be deliver'd up to my Mother and Sifter's Severities, which is a Misfortune, I can never endure.

Whilft I was fpeaking, Laurea look'd at me with the Eyes of a Fury: Don't you deferve the Fate you have met with, faid fhe? Nay, even more than what feems to threaten you. You have deceived me, perfidious as you are, and improv'd my Weaknefs in Favour of your Lover. I have just delivered up my Family to the Governour's Refentment, but don't think to escape me; you shall be my Victim, as I am your's. In pronouncing these Words, she flung her felf upon me, and I do not doubt, but wou'd have stifled me, had not Terefa come to my Affiftance; as well as my Father and Don Tiello, who hearing a Noife, ran, and freed me from this mad Creature's Rage; I ftood in want of their Help, for I did not refift her, prefering Death to an unhappy Life.

Don Tiello faw very well, to what a Condition my Grief had reduc'd me, and neglected nothing to eafe my troubled Mind; he beg'd

I wou'd no longer afflict my felf. I have prevail'd with your Father, Madam, faid he, and he has promis'd me to carry you to Morocco. I had not patience to hear any more, but upon these Assurances, went and flung my felf at my Father's Feet, and embracing his Knees, express'd my Gratitude; he told me with a great deal of Goodness, that, as it was Don Tiello's Request, he forgave me, and confented I flou'd marry Don Ramire. At these Words Laurea cry'd aloud, and made fuch Complaints, as wou'd move any one with Pity ; I knew by my felf what the fuffered. Alas! (faid I, to Terefa) were my Cafe like hers, how wretched shou'd I be? She loves Don Ramire, and was flatter'd with the Hopes of passing the rest of her Days with him, but now those agreeable Thoughts are all destroy'd. She loves him less than you imagine, reply'd Terefa, and if I had not done my utmost to make her pursue her first Intentions, I very much doubt the Performance of what the promis'd you. Here, Terefa related to us what had pass'd between them, as I have already inform'd you, Ma-dam; and Don Tiello told Laurea, the best Thing the cou'd do, was to return to Porta-Real before Day, that her Father might not know of her having a Hand in the Matter; to he took his Leave of us, and carrying her with him into the Boat, they both went afhore:

I had but just Time to change my Cloaths, when you came on Board, and your Trouble, Madam,

The PRINCE

Madam, interrupted the Pleafure I began to tafte, at the Thoughts of feeing Don Ramire, who as yet has not heard of my Misfortune; he will leave Morocco, perhaps, in Hopes of finding me at Porto-Real; his Paffion may make him forget the Danger, which threatens him at that Place, and I know not whether I fhall ever fee him more: I have alfo loft Terefa, who was fo true to me; this poor Creature was fnatch'd from me, by one of the Officers in the Admiral's Ship; my Prayers cou'd not prevent her being carried off by this Barbarian; and I affure you, Madam, had it not been for you, I fhou'd have funk under the Load of innumerable Calamities.

Here Inea endeavour'd to hide her Tears, but cou'd not restrain their Course. Felicia embrac'd her, and us'd many tender Expressions to foften her Sorrow. Alas, my Dear, faid fhe, I my felf am very unfortunate, and did you know the cruel Torments I endure, you wou'd own, you are not alone to be pitied; but I consider, it's Time for you to retire; I have kept you up too long. I am fenfible, Madam, reply'd Inea, I have tired your Patience with the Recital of my Adventures, but that's a Fault which attends all unhappy Lovers, fince the only Confolation they have left 'em, is that of lamenting their Fate. You do me Injustice, replied Felicia, if you have fo difobliging a Thought; I am extremely pleafed with your Compliance; and to convince you thereof, I will to Morrow, in Return, confide the the Secrets of my Life to you. In finishing these Words, she embrac'd her again, and *I*nea went to her Bed.

Phebus had no fooner grac'd the watery Plain, but young Inea (impatient to hear Felicia's Adventures) rofe, and faluted her with a pleafant Morning: I with, my Dear, (faid Felicia to her,) I had not clos'd my Eyes all Night, for I have had a frightful Dream concerning a Perfon, I very much efteem ; he appeared to me in the greatest Dangers, engag'd with the Moors, and vanquish'd. Oh, how my Soul is alarm'd! Your Mind is fo posses'd with difinal Ideas, reply'd Inea, that you must not be furpriz'd, if they affect you in your Sleep; yet, Madam, Dreams are not to be taken Notice of. Alas, faid Felicia, they wou'd make no Impression on me at any other Time; but what have I not to fear at prefent, being far from my Country, and from a Friend, whofe Abfence is the chief Caufe of my Uneafinefs? Tho' I own to you, Abelhamar's Passion for me, is no finall Addition to my Woes, fince I must be continually on my Guard against the Pursuits of a Prince, who has fo much Power in this Court. Unhappy Creature that I am! Were not my Misfortunes great enough? Why must the few Charms I have left, ferve only to render them the more infupportable? Don't add to your Affliction, Madam, faid Inea, the Prince has too much Refpect for you, to use his Authority in Oppolition to your Inclinations, and you may cafily eafily imagine, as foon as your Relations are inform'd of your Deftiny," they will employ all their Intereft to relieve you. I fhou'd be in the Wrong to doubt their Affection for me, reply'd Felicia weeping, tho' in their Opinion, my Behaviour merits no Favour. Oh! that I rather owed my Liberty to the Man, whofe Prefence now wou'd make me happy. I find you are in Love, Madam, (faid Inea, interrupting her.) I confefs it, reply'd Felicia blufhing; and fince you have given me fo great a Proof of your Confidence, I promife you mine, and will inform you of my Weaknefs.

Felicia began immediately to relate her Story, from the time her Father had contracted her to the Prince of Carency, but her Difcourfe was often interrupted with Tears, which the Thoughts of her Misfortunes extorted from her; I am not only concern'd, faid fhe, at my being feparated from the Count of La Vagne, but inconfolable, when I think, how Cafilda betray'd me, after having chofe her for my Friend, and lov'd her fincerely. I condemn her, reply'd Inea, and wonder how any one cou'd be fo perfidious, efpecially to a Perfon, who no ways deferv'd fuch inhuman Ufage.

They were talking in this manner, when the Governefs of the Slaves came, and bid 'em drefs themfelves, in order to wait on the Queen to the Mofquez, where they were oblig'd to attend, tho' Chriftians. Felicia, during the Ceremony of thofe Infidels, took fuch care to hide felf in her Veil, that altho' Abelhamar fought fought her with a great deal of Attention, he cou'd not diftinguish her from the rest of her Companions; he did not doubt but this Affectation was design'd, which so fensibly griev'd him, that he retir'd to his Apartment, and wrote the ensuing Letter.

WHAT Crime have I committed, lovely Felicia, to deferve your Aversion ? Tou fly me, and even deny me the Satisfaction of seeing your beauteous Face. Can you be offended at a Passion, your Charms have created ? What Violence have I not done my self, to suppress my Transports, rather than incur your Displeasure ? Ob ? treat me with less Severity; my Love is worthy a more obliging Return, since I am seeking Means to procure your Liberty, which I hope to effect, in spite of the Queen's Opposition.

Celima being return'd from the Mofquez, 6 79 15 order'd that fome of the Slaves shou'd come and work by her; Felicia was of the Number, and as Abelhamar was watching an Opportunity to give her this Letter, he approach'd her, and flip'd it into her Lap, which he thought fhe had perceiv'd, and wou'd have taken care to hide it; but it happen'd otherwife, for the Queen (who was inform'd of the Prince's Sentiments for Felicia) feeing him put a Paper into her Work, found Means to take it, fo was convinc'd of the Truth, and extremely pleas'd this young Spaniard made no Return to Abelhamar's Paffion. The Queen had had a fecret Averfion to him, tho' his only Crime was that of being lawful Heir to the Crown fhe was in Poffeffion of, which was a fufficient Motive, to make him difagreeable to her.

That Evening, Celima took a Walk in the Palace Gardens, and as fhe had a Mind to fpeak with Felicia, she call'd her, as it were, to lean on her Arm, and advanc'd towards a Terrace-Walk, from whence one cou'd difcover the Sea-Side, with a most delightful Profpect; there she fate down, and looking at Felicia with a graceful Air; Tho' you have not been with me long, faid fhe, I have a particular Kindnefs for you, and am willing to tell you, that if you have a Mind to merit my Affection, you must entirely banish Abelhamar from your Heart. I am inform'd of his Sentiments, and know part of your's; but it's to be fear'd, that a young Creature as you are, (having no other Engagement, and being flatter'd with the Hopes he gives you) might fa-crifice your Virtues to your Ambition; yet I cannot believe, you wou'd confent to be his Miftrefs; for that is all you must expect from a Man, who certainly never will Marry you. I do not know, Madam, answer'd Felicia, (with a great deal of Modesty) who cou'd speak to you of the Prince's Sentiments; but if your Majesty is inform'd of mine, you are convinc'd I have receiv'd his Offers in fuch a Manner, as ought to destroy all the Hopes, my Mis-fortunes might have given him; the Condition I am in, Madam, continu'd fhe, has not made made any difhonourable Impression on my Heart, and I bless Heaven, to find your Majesty so oppos'd to a Thing, which I cou'd not think on, without the greatest Horror; for in my Opinion, it is more glorious to die, than live a Life destitute of Virtue.

What! faid the Queen, wou'd you fooner chuse Death, than be Mistress to Abelhamar ? Who wou'd not, as well as I, Madam, (replied Felicia,) and what other Thought cou'd enter into one's Head ? This Refolution is my only Comfort, fince I know it to be an effe-Aual Way to deliver me from an infamous Paffion. But if you have a Lover in Spain, faid the Queen, do you confider, that in dy-ing at Sallee, you never will fee him more? Suppose there were any One, for whom I had an Inclination, replied Felicia, I shou'd be the more ready to die, as being the ftrongest Evincement I cou'd give him of my Conftancy; for if it were my Misfortune, not to live for him, I never wou'd for any other. Ha, Felivia! faid the Queen, fmiling, What do you tell me; is it possible that Cupid hath already fummon'd a Heart fo young? But alas, there is no Age free from his Empire; in one Moment the fatal Dart is lanc'd. Ending these Words, the figh'd, and remain'd fome Time in a deep Silence.

All the Ladies who attended the Queen, were ftanding at fuch a Diftance from the Place where fhe was fate, that fhe cou'd fpeak to Felicia without being heard; here, faid fhe, (taking O the the Prince's Letter from her Bofom,) fee what Abelhamar has wrote to you. I believe you are virtuous, therefore cannot fulpect your Conduct: When you fee him, take no Notice of my knowing his Sentiments; but advife him, not to perfevere in his Defign; for inflead of procuring your Liberty, as he promifes, perhaps he may lofe his own for the reft of his Days. This the pronounc'd with a melancholy Accent, then rofe, and return'd to the Palace.

Felicia, overjoy'd at what the Queen had faid to her, join'd Inea, whom she defired to stay with her in the Garden, and they both went, and fate down in the fame Place, which Celima had just quitted. Notwithstanding all the Misfortunes that afflict me, (faid Felicia to her Companion) I have Caufe to blefs Heaven, for the Disposition the Queen is in; she forbids me receiving the Prince's Addreffes; think, my Dear, how willing I am to obey her, and whether fhe had Need to use her Authority on this Occafion. I congratulate you, answer'd Inea, since it adds to your Comfort, but I cannot conceive out of what Motive she oppofes a Thing, which ought to be indifferent to her, unlefs she has her felf taken an Affection for him. I am apt to believe, faid Felicia, her Thoughts are employ'd on fome Object, and that her Heart is not entirely free from Love; for when the ask'd me, whether I had any Engagement, I perceiv'd she grew of a fudden fo penfiye, that it was fome Time be-before she cou'd recover her felf; yet I cannot think fhe likes the young Prince, for as fhe is Miftrefs of her Deftiny, I fuppofe fhe might make him her Husband if it were her Pleafure; I rather believe, fhe intends to keep him under an absolute Submission to her Will. Can fhe be fo little acquainted with the Motions of a Heart, interrupted Inea, to imagine Abelhamar's Sentiments will receive Laws from a Sovereign, whom he has fome Reafon to hate? As for my part, I know it wou'd be impossible for me, either to Love, or not Love, by Command; I might fo far prevail with my felf, as to be filent, or to counterfeit an Indifference, and yet I cannot tell, whether I shou'd act that Part fo well, as to pleafe those who wou'd lay fuch a Duty on me. I shall not difpute with you on that Subject, replied Felicia; but between us, I esteem it a great Happinefs, that my Inclination is fo ready to comply with the Qucen's Commands.

As fhe had finished her Discourse, she perceiv'd a Man near her, whom by the Light of the Moon, she knew to be Abelhamar, which not a little furpriz'd her; fhe rofe in order to run from him, but he took hold of her, and faid, Do not fly me thus, cruel Felicia; I am unfortunate enough, to have heard your Conversation with Celima, and cou'd wish my felf dead, rather than give you the Difpleafure of feeing me once more at your Feet. Here he was filent, but after some Time, con-continu'd in this Manner; What! did I think One, whom I look'd on a Divinity, wou'd approve of the unjust Queen's Barbarity, and reduce me to the last Despair, by an inhumane Ulage ? Take Care, ungrateful Felicia, how you behave your felf towards me. I am not here among Strangers, and Celima (who wou'd fain dispose of my Heart, as she does of my Crown) may find, Fortune is not always constant, and that Usurpers have ever Cause to fear. My Lord, replied Felicia, I perceive you heard what the Queen faid, relating to you; I must not concern my felf in Affairs of State, and fince you know my Sentiments, I shall make no Diffiulty in confessing them. It is true, I was fenfibly pleas'd to receive a Command fo politive, and conformable to my Inclination, for I cannot love an Enemy to-my Country and Religion. Why have I treated you like an Enemy ? answer'd the Prince: What Advantage did I take of my Victory? Was it a Crime to love, and ferve you ? I am fenfible of all you acted for me, interrupted Felicia, and my Gratitude is equal to your Favours; accept of it then, my Lord, as the only Return I can make, and it's even more than the Queen will confent to.

The Prince falling into a violent Paffion, lean'd himfelf against a Ballister of Marble Pillars, which boarded the Terrace-Walk, and looking at Felicia, with Despair in his Countenance; I fwear, faid he, by our great Mahomet, and by my Love, that if I don't enjoy you, you, I will put the Kingdom of Fez into Deiolation, pull down from the Throne the unworthy Princefs who fits on it, and burn this magnificent Palace to Ashes. You shall fee, Felicia, what fuch a Lover as I can do, when he finds himfelf despis'd. Your Eyes shall caufe more Confusion amongst us, than any Revo-lution ever did. Oh Heavens, my Lord! cry'd Felicia; can any thing be more dreadful, than fuch Defigns ? What! for an unfortunate Slave, as I'am, wou'd you disturb the Peace of this Nation? Are not my Woes great enough already; must you attempt to force me away from the Queen, after I have declar'd to you, that I will refolve on Death, fooner than confent to your Defires? My Lord, fince I must confess it, I am in Love with One in Spain, and I will as willingly give my Life, as marry any other; Abfence it felf shall never leffen my Affection for him: I know the Way to be constant, and preferve my Heart for One, who ---- No, I can hear you no longer, (faid the Prince, interrupting her) you endeavour to distract me, with the cruelest Things, you can imagine; but in Time, I will be reveng'd on you, the Queen, and that dangerous Rival. Finishing these Words, he left Felicia.

Her Affliction was fo great, that fhe had hardly reach'd the Palace, when the was feized with a violent Feaver, which continu'd all that Night. The Governess of the Slaves went next Morning, to acquaint the Queon of it, it, who fent Olympia Doria to flay by her. As foon as Felicia faw her enter the Chamber, fhe faid to her, with a languishing Air; The Condition I am in, Madam, will only give you Uneafinefs, and the Company of fo unfortunate a Creature as I, can be no ways agreeable to you. I cannot tell, whether it be a Pleasure to you, to see me, answer'd Olympia; but I know very well, nothing can give me a greater Satisfaction, than being with you ; and tho' I am in Expectation of the only Happinefs, that can blefs my Days, yet in quitting this Palace, I cannot help regretting the Absence of my charming Felicia. How obliging you are, my dearest Companion, (replied she) but alas! I shall have the greatest Caufe to regret, when I fee you no more. What Confolation wou'd it be me, were I going with you to Genoa; I have fome Reafons to wish it. I will not prefume to ask 'em, faid Olympia, fearing you shou'd think my Curiofity too great; but if you will tell me, why you are fo defirous of going that Voyage, I shall take it as a mighty Favour. I will grant your Request, replied Felicia, as foon as my Health permits me, and shall defire you alfo, to acquaint me with fome Particulars, relating to a Perfon of that Country. Which Olympia promis'd her; and after having flaid fome Time with her, she went, and gave the Queen an Account of the Condition fhe was in.

The mean while, Felicia and Inea entertain'd each other with their Grief, whenever they found found an Opportunity of being alone. Shou'd I inform the Queen of Abelhamar's Menaces, (faid Felicia, to her Friend) she wou'd take fuch Measures as might fecure the Peace and Tranquility of her Kingdom, and by fending me for Spain, deliver me from his Violence; but (continu'd she, after a Moment's Pause,) what Reproaches shou'd not I deferve, suppofing this young Prince was only urged by his Paffion, to fpeak as he did, without having any Thoughts of executing fo rafh a Defign, and that upon my Information, he shou'd be arrested; then his Difgrace, and perhaps the Loss of his Life, wou'd be owing to me? What an ungrateful Return shou'd 1 make, to the obliging Sentiments he conceiv'd for me, from the Beginning of my Misfortune? Inea approv'd very much her prudent Confiderations, and reprefented to her, how willingly the Queen wou'd embrace that Pretence, to make a Sacrifice of Abelhamar, whofe Paffion fhe only oppos'd, with a Defign to provoke him to use her with Disrespect, which wou'd confequently bring him to inevitable Punishment; and were it otherways, it wou'd not ftand with Reason, that the Queen shou'd concern her felf with any thing fo much below her, as a Slave. Felicia was of Inea's Opinion, and thought there was fo much Probability in what the faid, that the chofe rather to be filent in the Matter, than make a Difcovery, which might be the Caufe of greater Diforders; so implor'd the Affistance of Heaven far Q4 for her Deliverance. As for Inea, fhe had already writ the Particulars of her Voyage, to her Dear Don Ramire, and was impatiently waiting his Anfwer.

Abethamar, whofe Paffion was grown defperate, retired from the Queen's Palace to his own, and there confin'd himfelf with his faithful Mula: Cease flattering me, faid he; and don't make me hope any thing, from my Submission to the Queen, and Felicia. I now am too well inform'd, of what I must expect from their Cruelty. As I was walking in the Palace Garden, diftracted and melancholy, I perceiv'd at a Diftance, Celima follow'd by her Women; and to avoid paying my Court to her, I retired to a Grotto, under the Terrace-Walk, which I had just enter'd, when the Queen leaning on Felicia's Arm, came, and feated her felf in a Place, where I cou'd diftinctly hear all they faid; no Mula, it is not possible, to express the intolerable Aversion fhe has to me, and with what Difdain she fpeaks of me; fhe has given reiterated Commands to that lovely Captive, to fly and hate me, who (ungrateful as fhe is) not only re-ceiv'd 'em with Pleafure, but even promis'd Celima more than she requir'd of her; and it was not long before I felt the Effect of it, for as foon as the Queen was gone back to the Palace, and I cou'd find an Opportunity to fpeak to this young Slave, fhe confirm'd with a most rigorous Air what I had already heard, and moreover told me, the was in Love with One

One in Spain, and that nothing in the World thou'd ever make her change: In a Word, I find there is no Time to be loft; I muft immediately adhere to the King of Tituan's Propofals; that Prince extremely refents Celima's Refufal; a flighted Paffion demands Revenge, and he looks on me as One, who is capable of affifting him. Before I had feen Felicia, I wou'd not favour his Defigns, thinking the Queen might chufe me to Reign with her: Now I fee my Error; the not only hates me, but even oppofes my Happinefs, where-ever I feek it.

If I may be permitted to give you my Advice, my Lord, (reply'd Mula,) I am of Opinion, you fhou'd fpeak to Celima, before you enter into the King of Tituan's Intereft, and try whether you cannot bring her into a more favourable Difpofition for you; 'tis probable, fhe may make fome ferious Reflection, and for her own fake, not provoke you to act any Thing defperate. I am willing to make that one Step more, faid the Prince, tho' ever fo nice; but as I believe the Queen has a Defign to take me up, let us be prepar'd for the Worft: If I am put in Arreft, do you go to Tunis; tell Ifmael, the Number of Friends I have in this Court, and manage Affairs fo, as by his Affiftance, and theirs, I may obtain my Liberty, pofiefs my Love, and be reveng'd.

It was late before Abelhamar had ended his Converfation, which prevented him frem going the next Morning to the Queen's Apartment, ment; and the first Thing he heard, was Felicia's Illnefs. This News caus'd him to be extremely uneafy; he foon forgot all other Projects, and fix'd his chiefest Thoughts, on feeking Means to fee the Perfon he lov'd; which met with fome Opposition, Celima having given Orders he shou'd not be admitted into her Chamber; and as for the Governess of the Slaves, he cou'd not flatter himfelf with the Hopes of gaining her, being an old Woman, entirely devoted to the Queen's Will; fo that he was almost despairing of Success in his Enterprize; but what is not Love capable of? It conquers all Difficulties.

The Prince, being young and handfome, refolv'd to difguise himself in Woman's Cloaths, in order to be prefented to the Queen by a Captain of a Ship, with whom he was particularly acquainted. He was a perfect Mafter of the Spanish Tongue, and did not doubt, but he might eafily pais for One of that Nation. He told his Defign to Mula, who used his Endeavours to divert him from an Attempt, which might prove fatal to him ; but his Arguments were of little Weight, where Love had fo great an Influence. He order'd immediately his Physician to be call'd, and bid him give out every where he was dangeroufly ill of a Feaver, and that it was convenient he fhould fee no Company. This News being talk'd of at Court, the Sea-Captain brought him to the Palace, among feveral other Slaves, which he had lately taken. The Queen took a particular Notice of Abelhamar; and ask'd him fome Queflions, which might have puzled him, had not his Wit been preyailing, and his Replies fo ingenious, that they did not give her the leaft Sufpicion of a Difguife. The Governefs of the Slaves having ask'd his Name, he told her, he was call'd Eugenia, and that he was a Native of the Kingdom of Caflile: The Queen order'd, fhe fhou'd be conducted to Felicia, who perhaps might know her, and be much pleas'd to fee One of her Country.

Abelhamar was fent in this manner to Felicia, who was in Bed, very much indifpos'd. He no fooner enter'd her Chamber, but feeing her, in this Condition, he turn'd pale, and feem'd fo dejected, that it wou'd have pitied any One, that was prefent at this Interview. As Felicia and Inea believ'd, this new Slave's Affliction proceeded from her late Misfortune, they were no ways furpriz'd at the Diforder fhe was in, but endeavour'd by their kind Expressions, to fosten the Rigour of her unhappy State.

The amorous Prince thus continu'd with his dear Felicia, and the oftener he faw her, the greater were the Effects of her Charms; which at laft fo potently influenced him, that he cou'd not refolve to quit the Palace, effeeming himfelf too happy in the Company of his adorable Miftrefs. He had fo many Perfections, that it wou'd have been eafy for him to make the Conqueft of the Queen's handfomeft Slaves, Slaves, had he made the leaft Purfuit towards it; but his Heart was entirely fill'd with *Feli*cia's Idea, and all his Thoughts were employed on the only Care of pleafing her. She alfo very much contributed by her innocent Carefles, to detain him. Their Humours agreed fo well, that fhe defired as a Favour, they wou'd let Eugenia ftay with her during her Illnefs. There is a fecret Charm in your Conversation (faid fhe, fometimes to her) which gives me a much greater Pleasure, than any I can find in that of my other Com-panions. It is the Effect of my Love for you, beauteous Felicia, that infpires you with this Sympathy, replied the paffionate Prince, and how blefs'd shou'd I be, were I as dear to you, as you are to me! but, continu'd he, if you will give me Leave to tell you my Thoughts, I believe you are indifferent whe-ther belov'd or not. Alas! how great wou'd be my Felicity, (anfwer'd Felicia, with a me-lancholy Tone) were I fuch as you reprefent me : You little know my Sentiments; they give me more Uneafinefs, than my unfortu-nate Captivity. What, Madam, faid the pretended Eugenia, is it poffible, that after hav-ing wholly refign'd my felf to you, you wou'd make any thing a Secret to me? If your Heart is touch'd with a tender Paffion, will it not be a Comfort to you to make me your Confident? What shall I fay to you, replied Felicia? I can only tell you my Weaknefs, and confefs an Engagement, which is fo dear to me, that it

it fills my Soul at once with a Thoufand different Motions. These Words cruelly affected the Prince, who cou'd not utter one Syllable, but turning pale, he fix'd his Eyes on her, and continu'd fome Time in this Posture, as astonish'd at what she faid, tho' she had already. declar'd her Sentiments to him in the Garden: At last he endeavour'd to speak, and with a languishing Accent, faid, I shou'd not be furpriz'd, so perfect a Creature as you were ador'd, yet, Felicia, I flatter'd my felf, that far from having lost your Liberty, you were free from any Passion. This Opinion pleas'd me extremely, for although we are of one Sex, I must tell you, I take delight in gaining the Affections of a young unpractis'd Heart, who is unacquainted with Sentiments fo destructive to our Peace. This made me conceive a particular Friendship for you; but I understand, your Disdain for some, is equal to your Weaknefs for others. Oh! what Shame and Diforder do you caufe in me? (replied Felicia, covering her Face with her Handkerchief,) I expected in telling you my Secret, you wou'd have pitied, and confol'd me; alas! do you upbraid me, Eugenia ? Your Severity will compel me hereafter to fear, and fly you. The unhappy Prince, at thefe Words, flung himfelf on his Knees, and taking her Hand, kils'd and bath'd it with Tears; his Speech was fuppreß'd with Sighs, which wou'd have been fufficient to difcover him, were it not that Felicia had a ftrong Opinion of his being of her her own Sex, and did not in the leaft take Notice of his paffionate Expressions.

Inea enter'd the Chamber, whilft they were in this filent and melancholy Condition: What is the Caufe of this Sorrow, faid fhe? Is this the Way, Eugenia, you entertain our dear fick Lady? You have, without doubt, faid fomething to her, which renews the Re-membrance of her paft Misfortunes. I have faid nothing to Felicia, interrupted the Prince immediately, but what was agreeable to her, therefore do not accuse me; I wou'd undergo any Pain my felf, rather than aggravate hers. Alas, Inea! faid Felicia, here cruel Eugenia has been reproaching me with Sentiments, I have for a Perfon, whom she her felf wou'd love, were fhe as well acquainted with him as I am. No (replied Eugenia) I am convinced of the contrary; I even have an invincible Averfion to this unknown, who perfidioufly robs me of your Heart, which is a Crime not to be forgiven. This is no Subject to create a Difpute between you and I, faid Felicia; the Affection we have for a Lover, or a Friend, is of fo different a Nature, that the one does no Prejudice to the other. Give me Leave to tell you, cry'd the young Prince, that when a Heart is touch'd with a powerful Paffion, it's incapable of receiving any other Impression. Then you don't believe I love you, Eugenia, interrupted Felicia ? I know not what to believe, replied the Prince; but what I am affur'd of, is, no Creature can be in greater greater Defpair. As he ended thefe Words, Olympia enter'd the Chamber.

It is given out in the Palace, faid fhe, that Prince Abelhamar, having counterfeited a Sicknefs, is gone away fecretly, in order to affift Ismael, King of Tunis, who intends to declare War against the Queen; which News has fo much alarm'd her, that she has given Or-ders to search his Apartment, in spite of what his Phyfician fays to oppose his being feen; and if it be poffible to penetrate into the Queen's Sentiments by her Uneafinefs, fhe is in a great Apprehension concerning the Confequence of this fudden Departure. The Queen's Thoughts and mine are as different as our Interest, replied Felicia; fhe is concern'd at the Prince's being gone, and I am overjoy'd at it. Abelhamar, who had not interrupted Olympia's Discourse, cou'd not help looking carneftly at Felicia; that Prince is very unfortunate, faid he, that his Abfence fhou'd give you fo much Pleafure: I perceive the Love and Respect he has for you, meet with a very unkind Return. What is become of that Complaifance you flow'd us at first, my dear Eugenia, re-plied Felicia; you equally blame me for hav-ing an Inclination, and for not having one. I think it wou'd not be reasonable for me to have any other Sentiments for Abelhamar; and I am even affur'd, that if I liked him, you your felf wou'd condemn me. Try, Madam, continu'd Eugenia, strive to love the Prince, were it only to be reveng'd, and to punish me for for my Capricioufness; I promife you before it be long, I will renderhis Paffion very difagreeable to you. I fhall not give you that Trouble, replied Felicia, my Conftancy might then be brought in Queffion; it is dangerous to make fuch Tryals. These Words sensibly affected Abelhamar, whose paffionate Looks express'd fuch Emotions, that is was furprizing Felicia, Inea and Olympia fuspected nothing extraordinary under the Difguife.

But what Advantage did the young Prince receive from this Stratagem? He faw Felicia, and daily difcover'd fome transcendent Charms, which inflam'd him the more, and increas'd his Despair, when he reflected on the Sentiments she had for him; for his Passion was not only violent, but fo nice, that he wou'd not have been fatisfy'd with the Possession of her Perfon, without that of her Heart; and as he knew he had no Share in her Affection, it threw him fometimes into fuch a deep Melancholy, as cou'd not be conceal'd. Befides, the Queen being inform'd of Abelhamar's Counterfeit Sicknefs, his going off, and part of his Defigns, gave Orders, that those Offi-cers, who ferv'd him, and cou'd give her fur-ther Light into the Affair, might be taken up, and examin'd: She was alfo raifing Troops, repairing the Fortifications of the Town, and raking all Meafures neceffary to fecure her felf against the Infults of an Enemy, whom fhe thought already with the King of Tunis, tho' every Day in her Chamber, and fometimes times lying at her Bed's Feet; thus the amourous Prince elected his Felicity, in a Confinement, where he was exposed to a Danger he did not apprehend, and good Fortune was fo favourable to him till then, that his Difguife did not give the leaft Caufe of Sufpicion.

Felicia's Illnefs, tho' extremely violent, did not continue long; her Youth and good Conflitution contributed very much to her fpeedy Recovery, and gave her Strength enough to walk in the Palace Gardens. The Court at that Time was fo attentive on the Preparations of War, that the Slaves were not fo flrictly watch'd as ufual. One Day Felicia, Olympia, Ined, and our Counterfeit Eugenia taking the Air, had turn'd their Steps towards a pleafant Terrace-Walk, which afforded a moft agreeable Profpect; but the Weather changing, there fuddenly rofe a High Wind, fucceeded by terrible Thunder and Hail, which oblig'd them to run for Shelter into a little Summer-Houfe, that had a View on the Ocean.

Felicia and Inea were looking out of a Window, and had been fome Time obferving the Sea, which furioufly came, and broke againft the Rocks, making a horrid Noife, when they perceived a Ship in the greateft Danger; fhe had loft all her Mafts, and thus tofs'd from Wave to Wave, was waiting the fatal Moment. Thefe young Ladies were moved with Compaffion at fuch a Sight, and concern'd for those who were on Board: They R implor'd implor'd the Affiftance of Heaven, and whilft they were making Vows for their Safety, the Wind decided their Deftiny, for the Ship was driven afhore, and there entirely wreck'd. It was a most difinal Scene, to fee how these unfortunate Wretches strove to fave themselves, but their Efforts were fruitles; they All perished excepting One, who was happy enough to reach a little Rock, which lay at a small Diftance from the Shore.

Diftance from the Shore. The Storm being allay'd, fome Fishermen, who had feen the Shipwreck, took their Boat, and row'd towards the Rock, where they found the Man I mention'd in a Swoon, and as cold as Death; they took him and brought him ashoar, where they immediately lighted a Fire, and gave him all the Help they were capable of.

Thefe Things happen'd fo near the Summer-Houfe, where our young Captives were retired, that they cou'd eafily fee the Condition this Stranger was in; but how great was Felicia and Olympia's Diforder, when they knew him to be the Count of La Vagne: They wou'd have express'd their Satisfaction, were it not for the Fear they were in of his being Dead. It is he, (cried Olympia in her first Transports) it is certainly himself. Felicia on the other Side, (pressing Inea and Eugenia's Hands) cou'd no more be Mistress of her Moderation; Oh Heavens! faid she to them, my dearess Companions; there is the Man whose Absence has given me fo much Displeasfure; he appears now.

now, just as he did when I found him in the Forest of Carmona, where he had been attacked by Robbers; the Picture of Death was painted on his Face: I was then in a Condition to affist him, but now alas, I am forced to see him perish, without being at Liberty to give him any Help.

Whilft fhe was thus fpeaking to Inea, and the difguis'd Prince, Olympia left 'em, and ran to a Door adjacent to the Sea-Side, which fhe caus'd to be opened without any Difficulty, and in a fmall Time reach'd the Place where the Count was lying: As foon as Felicia perceived the Concern, and Care fhe express'd in affifting him, fhe knew not what to think. I am well perfwaded, faid fhe, they are both Natives of Genoa, and perhaps Relations; but methinks her Affection is very great, fince fhe weeps as well as I, and embraces him in fuch a paffionate Manner.

The mean while Abelhamar (enrag'd and jealous) was acting the greateft Violence on himfelf, in not difcovering to her who he was, that he might refolve on the immediate Sacrifice of this dangerous Rival. Inea's Thoughts were alfo confus'd, and fhe was hardly able to fpeak a Word. The more fhe confider'd Olympia's tender Concern for the Count of La Vagne, and the fecret Confolation fhe feem'd to derive from his Prefence, the more fhe figh'd, and fent her Wifhes to her faithful Don Ramire; in a Word, it is not to be conceiv'd, how tormented they all were by different Caufes of Unea-R 2 finefs. But how was lovely Felicia's Mind employ'd all this while, and what were her inward Motions, when the faw the Count recovered from his Swoon, who appeared in Transports of inexpressible Joy, at the Sight of Olympia? He kifs'd her Hand, and fix'd his Eyes on her's, as if Fortune had fnatch'd him from the Arms of Death, only to lead him into perfect Felicity. Am I then betray'd, (cried Felicia, in a faint Voice) and can I believe what I fee? Is the Count of La Vagne in Love with Olympia? You ought not in the leaft to doubt it, (anfwer'd Eugenia, who was very willing to confirm her Sufpicions) and if you flatter'd your felf with being belov'd, you are mistaken in the Heart of that Traytor; any one may fee by his Actions, that he has a Paffion for Olympia. Do not have fo rash an Opinion of him, interrupted Inea; it's probable he has fome particular Reafons for acting as he does; perhaps the Count is inform'd of Prince Abelhamar's Passion for Felicia, and as he is come in order to ranfom his Mistrefs, he thought it convenient to conceal his true Sentiments, the better to fucceed in his Defigns. What Pleafure you take in being deceiv'd, (cried Eugenia, who cou'd not bear to hear her express her felf in this Manner;) have you already forgot that Abelhamar is fufpected to be with the King of Tunis, and con-fequently there are no Measures to be observ'd with him? But the Count knows nothing of it, interrupted Felicia, and I am inclin'd to be-believe, Inea has interpreted the Sentiments of his Heart. How great is our Weaknefs when we love, faid the Prince; we fcarcely can credit our own Eyes, we are fo inclin'd to em-brace any Thing which flatters our Wifhes. Indeed Eugenia, replied Felicia, you always re-prefent Things in the falteft Colours : What have I done to invite you to take fuch Delight in tormenting me. The Prince, who perceiv'd fhe was difpleafed, faid no more to her, but refolv'd in himfelf to make the Force of his Rcvenge fall on this happy Rival.

Olympia fent to acquaint the Queen, that the Count of La Vagne was cast on the Shoar, but had escaped Death, and beg'd Leave to pay his Respects to her Majesty. Celima (who was exceeding melancholy, and apprehensive of the Confequences of Abelhamar's Revolt) declin'd feeing this Stranger, not to let him be Witnefs of her Affliction; but fent back to Olympia, to tell her, fhe might bring him to the Palace, where fhe thou'd have an Apartment prepared for him in One of the remote Pavilions, having given Orders that he shou'd be receiv'd with a Distinction equal to his Birth; to this fhe added, how willing she shou'd be to admit him, were she not indispensibly oblig'd to attend fome Affairs of the higheft Moment. She gave Orders alfo, that they fhou'd fupply him with all Neceffa-ries, and feveral Slaves immediately brought him Variety of rich Garments, that he might please his Fancy. Whilst Olympia went to re-R 3

turn the Queen Thanks for her Favours, the Count was conducted through the Gardens to the Palace.

Felicia, Inea and Eugenia, were walking in an Alley, which had a View on the Sea-Side, when the Count of La Vagne came up pretty near to them; Felicia perceiving him, her Heart fluttered, and fhe grew fo faint in an Inftant, that had not Inea fupported her on one Side, and the difguis'd Prince on the other, fhe would not have been able to ftand; but the Count (who had no Caufe to remark her Motions, tho' in Favour of himfelf) pafs'd by the Ladies, and only faluted them with much Refpect, without taking any particular Notice of Felicia.

As foon as he was gone far enough from her not to be heard; Oh Heaven! cry'd she, is it possible he can be fo much Master of his Temper, as not to fhow fome Tendernefs in his Eyes? He looks as if he had never feen me: What means this Indifference, Inea? Are thefe his Transports? Oh! What must I think of his Paffion? Madam! reply'd Inea, is not his coming hither to fetch you away, a fufficient Motive to convince you of his Fidelity? Inea only deceives you, interrupted the Prince, for I have feen many Perfons in Love, and can affure you, that altho' they were in a continual Reffraint, and obliged to be on their Guard in the Prefence of jealous Obfervers, yet their Paffion discover'd it felf in their Eyes and Actions. Why (continu'd he, addreffing him-1.33 himfelf to Inea) do you really think the Count of La Vagne was overjoy'd to fee Felicia? He did not io much as change Colour, nor even fix his Eyes on hers: No, no, his Paffion is not fo violent as you imagine; and if you continue fpeaking in his Favour, you only do it with an Intent to footh our Friend's Pain. Don't torment me in this Manner, cruel Creature, cry'd Felicia; am I not unfortunate enough already? Why will you perfift in faying fuch vexatious Things to me? Have you refolv'd on my Death? I take Heaven to Witnefs, reply'd the Prince fighing, that I have no fuch Intention; you wou'd certainly judge more favourably of my Sentiments, were they well known to you.

Felicia fearing it wou'd be taken Notice of at the Palace, that fhe had been fo long Abroad, returned fpeedily to her Chamber, which fhe no fooner enter'd, but wrote to the Count in the following Terms.

I Have now fome Reafon to flatter my felf, that Heaven will foon put a Period to my Misfortunes, fince Love and Generofity have invited you here to your Felicia's Deliverance. How shall I express my Joy, my Affection, and my Gratitude, and when shall I be at Liberty to entertain you with my tender Sentiments? Alass! what Violence did not I do my felf in seeing you so near me, without speaking to you; but how was it posfible, you cou'd pass by me with such an Air of Indifference? I must confess it very much affected R 4 me, and if I may tell you my Thoughts, I almost fuspected your Fidelity. I began to fear, you had devoted all your Transports to Olympia; this extremely augmented my Uneasiness; being an Effect of my Delicacy, which you must pardon. Let me know how I am to behave my self hereaster in this Coart, and don't neglect any Thing to procure us a speedy Departure. I hope Fortune will influence the Interest of our Hearts, and crown our Sufferings with eternal Felicity.

This Letter cou'd not be convey'd to the Count without fome Difficulty. Felicia bid Inea read it, and conjured her to find Means to have it immediately deliver'd into his Hands. I cannot think on any Way, reply'd Inea, but to carry it my felf. Your felf! cry'd Felicia, how will you venture to do it? Leave that to me, Madam, anfwer'd Inea, I will run any Rifque to ferve you. This is very generous, my dear Companion, faid Felicia; then thanked her for fo obliging an Offer, and defir'd her, fince fhe was willing to render her fo confiderable a Service, not to defer it.

Olympia was now in the Queen's Apartment, and the Count in his, but being extremely impatient to fee his lovely Miftrefs, he ftep'd into the Garden in Expectation of meeting her; It was a fine Moon-light Night, and as he was walking with his Thoughts wholly employ'd on the Happinefs he promis'd himfelf, in the Poffeffion of a Lady, for whom he had to transcendent a Paffion; young Inea (wraped ed in her white Vail) accofted him, and faid, read this Letter, my Lord; it comes from a Perfon who ought to be dear to you. The Count open'd it, and was furpriz'd not to know the Writing; after having read it over, and over, without conceiving the Meaning, it came into his Head, that it was a Jeft Olympia had imagin'd to divert her felf, fo faid to Inea, I defire you will tell the beauteous Lady, from whom I receive this Favour, that I intend my felf to be Bearer of the Anfwer.

As Inea was going back, fhe perceiv'd a Woman at a Diftance cover'd with her Vail, who was coming towards her, and fearing fhe fhou'd be known by her, fhe pafs'd on the other Side of the Pallifadoes, and went into the long Walk, where the found Felicia, who taking her under the Arm, faid to her in a low Voice; you will think me very impatient to know what the Count has faid to you, but that is not the only Reafon which brought me hither. I was looking out of my Chamber-Window, waiting your Return, when I faw a Woman crofs the Garden with great Diligence, and go, as it were, towards the Count's Pavilion: I must confess, my dear Inea, it gave me much Uneafinefs, and I made all poffible Haste to follow her. As far as I cou'd diftinguish, she appear'd to me to be Olympia, and I believe it is her. Oh! Inea, how my Heart akes! and in what Torment is my Mind, for fear of losing the Object of my Love? Judge more favourably of the Count, faid Inea, interrupting terrupting her; he read your Letter with an extreme Attention, and addreffing me in very obliging Terms, affur'd me, he wou'd anfwer it perfonally. It's very well, continu'd Felicia, but let us go on without making a Noife; we may perhaps, difcover where that Perfon is going, whom I mention'd to you. In finifhing thefe Words, they walk'd on, hiding themfelves behind the Pallifadoes; and hearing fome Body talk in an Arbour, which was at the End of the Alley, they drew near.

The Count of La Vagne and Olympia, were converfing together in this Place; it is impoffible, Madam, faid he to his Mistress, for me to express the Despair I was in, when I heard of your Death, and the Circumstances which preceded it ; they fo intirely affected me, that even Life began to be odious to me, and never was Mortal in a more defolate Condition. But how transported was I, at the unexpected Change of Fortune, when the Jeweller (who had feen you in the Queen's Apartment) inform'd me, that the fame beauteous Olympia, whofe Lofs I was deploring, was actually living, and at Sallee; judge---- I well conceive, my dear Count, faid she, interrupting him, what might employ your Thoughts in Two fuch different Occasions; as our Affection is mutual, we fympathize in all the Plcafure and Torment, which derives from our good or bad Fortune; you may imagine after what I fuffer'd for your supposed Death, how excellive was my Joy, when I heard of your Safety.

Safety. I have told you already, faid the Count, that your illustrious Father has given his Confent to our happy Union, receiving my Proposals with fuch extraordinary Marks of Friendship, that I must confess, I shou'd have suspected fo uncommon a Favour, were it not that my long Sufferings give me a Title to so great a Reward. Yes, continu'd he, most divine Olympia, you are now to be mine, and I for ever yours. As they were speaking in this manner, a doleful Voice interrupted them, which (repeating these Words, I am dying,) gave 'em to understand, that some Perfon very near the Arbour, was taken ill. This induc'd them to discontinue their Conversation, tho' ever so complaining fo dismally.

They look'd on every Side, without perceiving any one, but hearing fome Noife behind the Pallifadoes, they approach'd and faw Inea, holding in her Arms, Felicia, in a Swoon. Ah, my Lord! don't come near, cry'd Inea, weeping; your Prefence wou'd become fatal to Felicia, and you, Madam! (continu'd fhe, fpeaking to Olympia.) I beg, as a Favour, fhe may not fee you. What Averfion can fhe have to us? (reply'd they both at the fame Time,) We do not know her, and it wou'd be ftrange fhe fhou'd hate us without Caufe. This is not a proper Time to explain Matters, anfwer'd Inea; all the Affiftance I defire of you, is, to run to the Palace, and fend us fome Help.

Olympia

Olympia (without making any Reply, tho' extremely aftonish'd at what she heard) went to give Notice to Eugenia, and fome other of the Slaves, of the Condition Felicia was in, and the mean while the Count staid by her. No, faid he to Inea, I cannot go from you, till you have unriddled this Secret to me; was it not you that just now gave me a Letter, which I do not understand the meaning of? One wou'd think by your Air and Words, that I had difoblig'd this Fair Lady; but alas! how cou'd I have done any thing, either to deferve her Anger, or your Reproaches ? It's impossible, reply'd Inea, to diffemble better, and conceal with more Confidence, the horridest Perfidiousness, that Man cou'd ever act against a Lady of Birth and Merit. Don't expect, my Lord, that I will explain Things to you, which you know better than I. The Count of La Vagne cou'd not have help'd laughing at fo odd and obscure an Answer, had not the Condition Felicia was in infpired him with great Compassion, and finding Inea feem'd difpleas'd at his remaining there, he refolv'd to retire.

By this Time, feveral Slaves were come to Felicia's Help, and among others, Eugenia, or the difguis'd Prince, who feeing her in a Swoon, express'd his Affliction in Terms fo paffionate, that his Counterfeit was foon difeover'd. Unfortunate Eugenia, (cry'd he, in a doleful Accent) thou art going to be depriv'd of the only Object of thy Love. Felicia! my dear dear Felicia! to what a fad State are you reduc'd? Divineft Creature, if I lofe you, my Death fhall fucceed your's, fince I cannot live without you. Whilft he was talking in this manner, Inea and her Companions were throwing Water on Felicia's Face, but as their Affiftance cou'd not recover her, they carry'd her to her Chamber. The Prince, as you may imagine, furpafs'd the reft in attending his fick Miftrefs; as foon as fhe was lain in Bed, he fate by her, and forgetting himfelf, his exceffive Grief forc'd from him fuch Exprefions, as were not becoming his Female Difguife.

The Governefs of the Slaves, who watchfully obferv'd every thing, took Notice of his Words, and examining earneftly Eugenia's Features, difcover'd Prince Abelhamar's Refemblance. She ran immediately and related what had pafs'd to the Queen, who was not a little furpriz'd at this unexpected Adventure. It was late at Night, therefore fhe wou'd not call a Council, fearing it might alarm the People, who were already under great Apprehenfions from the King of Tunis's landing, fo defer'd, till next Day, taking any Refolution againft the Prince.

He little knew the Danger which threaten'd him; all his Thoughts were then employ'd on the State Felicia was in, nor cou'd he reflect on any thing more tormenting. She fearcely recover'dher Speech, but lamented being reftor'd to a Life, which at that Time, all Things render'd burthenfome to her. Inea, apprehending that that the Violence of her Affliction, wou'd force her into fuch Complaints as ought to be conceal'd, told her Companions, who were prefent, that it was convenient Felicia fhou'd be left to take a little Reft, and that Eugenia and fhe wou'd ftay by her; the others hearing this, immediately retired.

Félicia, after they were gone, gave an entire Courfe to her exceffive Grief; fee, Inea! cry'd fhe, fee, what Calamities I labour under! I am remote from my Country, out of Favour with my Family, become a Slave, and betray'd by a Man, who appear'd to me deferving of every thing; he is now in Love with another; 'tis Olympia he is come to deliver: This Lover, whom the impatiently expected, and receiv'd with to much Joy, is the fame, on whom I bestow'd my tender Care, when in a most dangerous Condition, and my Solitude afforded him a Refuge from the Fury of his Enemies. He conceiv'd a Paffion for me, engag'd me by a Thousand Promises to make a Return, and vow'd his Love shou'd be eternal. But Heavens! how perfidious has he prov'd? I remember now, as an Evincement, he facri-fic'd Olympia's Picture to me, which perfwaded me, I had feen her Resemblance before. Oh! what a fad Object am I, of Fortune's Capricioufnefs? Here fhe was filent a long. Time. Alas! what have I done, faid fhe again, to deferve at fo tender an Age, fuch a Series of Misfortunes : Yesterday I was deploring the Absence of the Man I lov'd;

lov'd ; this Day I lament the Lofs of his Heart. Her Sighs and Tears interrupted her feveral Times whilft fhe was fpeaking, and at last, she cou'd say no more. The Prince flat-tering himself with some small Hopes, took this Time to fpeak to her; if you were in a a Condition, to tafte the Pleafure of Revenge, faid he, you wou'd be foon fatisfy'd; my Arm fhou'd fecond your Refentment; for 'tis no longer in my Power, charming Felicia, to conceal, what my excellive Pallion for you has made me undertake. See at your Feet, wretch-ed Abelhamar, your Slave! Here I remain in this Palace for your fake, altho' I know, that were the Queen inform'd of it, my Life wou'd attone for my Crime. Compare this Proof of my Love, with that of my unworthy Rival's, whom you prefer, and then you will own your felf the most unjust Person in the World. Oh Heavens! (cry'd Felicia) can I believe. my Eyes? What new Fatality doth attend me? You here, my Lord! and an Enemy to the Queen? Have you been my Confident, and carefs'd me by fo many Days, without my perceiving the Deceit? Alas! where shall I go for

Refuge ? What must the Queen think of me ? Will she not have sufficient Reason to suffect my Virtue? Can any one imagine, that without my Consent, you wou'd have made so rash an Attempt? Ah! nothing but Death can relieve me from my Missortune. Abelhamar's Disorder was so great, that he did not fay much in his Justification; and as for Inea, who was

was prefent at this Scene, she cou'd not deny them her Compassion. She endeavour'd to excufe him, and faid to Felicia, the true Refpect the Prince has for you, Madam, ought in fome Meafure to appeale you, fince no Body knows of his being difguis'd: Your Honour, which is dearer to him than his Life, and the inevitable Danger that threatens him, if the Queen stiou'd be inform'd of what has pass'd, will engage him to keep fecret an Affair of this Importance. You are very little acquainted with Mankind, interrupted Felicia, who glory in relating their Adventures, and never love fo fincerely, as to make any Thing a Secret. Well, my Lord, (continu'd fhe, addreffing herfelf to the Prince) you have made your last Efforts to augment my Miferies; I fhou'd have dy'd efteem'd by Thofe who know me, but at present shall deserve their Contempt. You may go now to the Count of La Vagne, and tell him, that fince he has facrific'd me to O-lympia, I have quitted him for you, and contriv'd this criminal Difguife to favour your Admittance. Know me better, Madam, reply'd Abelhamar ; were not my Paffion for you tranfcendent, I shou'd never deviate from the Rules of Honour, and what I owe you. No, my Felicia, you shall never find me guilty of acting any thing, that may incur your Difplea-fure; yet I cannot help faying, you ought no longer to deplore the Lofs of a Man, fo un-worthy your Efteem, who without Difpute has deceived you; for 'tis impossible, if he once once lov'd you, he cou'd ever love another. Divine Felicia! be convinc'd of the Power of your Charms, and think, that I, who feel their Effects, can never change. The prefent Situation of Affairs gives me Hopes of a happy Turn in my Fortune. I may alcend the Throne on which my Anceftors were feated; but, oh Felicia! what Pleafure can it afford me to poffess a Crown without you? I intreat you now to grant a Requeft, you cannot reasonably refuse me, which is, to forget your perfidious Lover, and receive the Vows of the most paffionate, and most constant of Mankind: If you compare my Sentiments with his, you will do Justice to my fincere Passion; you shall be deliver'd from your Captivity, and fhall give Laws to the Queen, whofe Chains you now wear. Ah! my Lord, (cry'd Felicia in a dejected Tone,) I defire nothing but Death, therefore give me Leave to complain, and do not interrupt my Grief with Propofals, which I cannot accept. I have not Power to forget the Traytor, who thus neglects me: I love him still, spite of all the Reasons I have to hate him, and fhou'd I be doom'd to fink under my grievous Woes, or even live to despife the Author of my prefent Pain, do not think that a Crown cou'd invite me, ever to believe perfidious Man again.

Abelhamar heard her with an unconceivable Anguish, and had not Strength to make a Reply, but look'd at her with the greatest Concern; and his Sighs interpreted the tor-S menting 258

menting Motions of his Soul. Felicia was not, in a Condition to observe the Despair, this young Prince was reduc'd to, but renew'd her young Prince was reduced to, but renewed her Complaints, and nothing cou'd reftrain the Courfe of her Tears. What are you doing, Madam, faid Inea to her? Is it poffible, that a Perfon fo charming fhou'd regret the Lofs of a Man, who even difowns you, and abandons you, to go away with Olympia? Is it thus he ungratefully repays the obliging Sentiments you have for him? Call Revenge to your Aid, Madam: forget a Man who forfakes you and Madam; forget a Man who forfakes you, and It is eafy, my Dear, reply'd Felicia, to give Advice on fuch an Occafion, I wou'd do the fame to you, were you in my Cafe, and I in your's: But do you think, it is in our Powerto act as we pleafe, when Love has once render'd himfelf Master of our Inclinations ? Ah! cruel Rival, what Torment do you give me? And you perfidious Count, fhall not I fee you punish'd for your Ingratitude? Imploy my Arm, Madam, interrupted the Prince, and with your Confent, I will revenge you of your perjur'd Lover. I wou'd fooner resolve to die, faid Felicia, than yield to fo inhuman a Propofal; the only Favour I defire of you, my Lord, (which I conjure you not to deny me) is, that you will leave me; you are no longer Eugenia, you are a Prince whom I dare not admit at this Time of Night into my Cham-ber; my Peace and Honour depend on your Compliance. Think of the Dependent Compliance: Think of the Danger you expofe pose your self to, for a Person who can make you no Return. That is the only Misfortune I fear, interrupted Abelhamar; every Thing else might be easily surmounted. Retire, my Lord, reply'd Felicia, I am extremely uneasy at your being here. The Prince, perceiving it was in vain to result, withdrew, but not without affuring her, that altho' he were to fuffer innumerable Torments, thro' her Indifferency, yet his Passion shou'd ever be the fame.

Olympia Doria, all that Evening, had not found an Opportunity to speak to the Count of La Vagne, which made her pass the rest of that Night in fuch an Agitation of Mind, as troubled the Joy fhe ought to have receiv'd, at fo agreeable a Change in her Fortune. What means, faid she, Felicia's swooning away, and Inea's Anger; cou'd they have such Motions for a Stranger? Yet the Count pretends not to know them, and this Diffimulation feems to me very Criminal; how can I tell, whether in his Travels he did not come acquainted with this young Lady, and who can affure me, they do not love each other? These melancholy Thoughts tormented her cruelly, and the Count on his Side was not lefs unea-fy, fearing Olympia wou'd let her felf be deceiv'd by Appearances; for tho' he cou'd not penetrate into this Mystery, he saw enough to make him apprehend, it might give his Miftrefs fome Sufpicion; and as his Paffion for her invited him to prefer Death to her Difpleasure, he impatiently waited for Morning to undeceive her. S 2. As

As they had an equal Defire to entertain one another, they role early, and met on the Terrace-Walk. Olympia, the better to know the Count's Sentiments, endeavour'd to conceal her Uneafinefs, but her Melancholy foon discover'd her secret Thoughts. The Count alfo appear'd fo dejected, that one might eafily imagine what pass'd in his Soul: He broke Silence first, and ask'd her, how she had re-pos'd? To which she answer'd with Indifferency, that fhe had refted very ill, without know-ing the Caufe: Here Olympia's Sighs inter-rupted her Difcourfe. Ah, Madam! (faid the Count, prostrating himself at her Feet) do not let me be long uncertain of my Deftiny; you are not the fame you were Yesterday; what have I done, to deferve from you to cold a Reception ? I have not Refolution enough to be filent, reply'd Olympia, tho' it was my Defign; it is unjust to harbour Suspicions of the Perfon one loves, without coming to an Eclaircifement. Tell me, my Lord, Do you ftill love Felicia? I fay ftill, because after what has pass'd, I have no Reason to doubt, but you once had a Passion for her. The Count wou'd not let Olympia persevere in an Error, which was to the Prejudice of his Honour; he fcon by his Protestations perfwaded her of the contrary, then offer'd to go with her to justify himself before Felicia and Inea. I believe you, my Lord, faid she, without such a Proof, fince I had much rather you shou'd not fee 'em any more. The Queen has confented to our

our leaving this Place, therefore let us go, for the Approach of the King of Tunis terrifies me. It wou'd be very unfortunate shou'd we find our felves belieg'd here, at a Time that my Father is difpos'd to favour us. Let us depart, reply'd the transported Count, there is nothing I wilh fo much; I have a Ship now ready to fail for Italy, and only waits for a favourable Wind; may Heavens protect our Voyage, and bring me to my long with'd for Happiness; come, Madam, added he, dispose all Things for your Departure; every Moment will feem to me an Age, till Hymen has crown'd my Love with the Union of our Deftinies.

Thefe endearing Expressions highly pleas'd Olympia, who immediately went to the Queen, and obtain'd Leave to embark; Celima at the fame Time reftor'd to their Liberty the young Slaves that were taken with Olympia, then prefented her with her Picture, fet round with Diamonds of great Value, and repeated to her, what fhe had already faid in Behalf of the Count of La Vagne; withal, that at another Time, she shou'd have been very glad to sce him. Olympia, having return'd her Acknowledgments in a most respectful Manner, went into the Slaves Apartment, where the chofe the Ladies 1 mention'd, and took her Leave of the reft, who by their Tears and Careffes shew'd the particular Affection they had for her. As she doubted whether it were proper to see Felicia, she desir'd the Governess of the Slaves

Slaves to acquaint her with her Departure; but at the Name of Olympia, and the News of her going away, fhe fetch'd a Shrick, and made fuch Complaints, as wou'd have infpir'd the hardeft Heart with Pity : Olympia hearing this, wou'd not aggravate her Pain by her Prefence, and tho' fhe paffionately wifh'd to entertain Felicia, that fhe might know from her, whether the Count of La Vagne was fincere in what he had told her, yet fhe was no ways willing to fatisfy her felf, at the Expence of fo amiable a Perfon.

The Count was expecting Olympia with Im-patience, when she came to tell him the Fa-vours she had receiv'd from the Queen, who order'd fome of her Officers to accompany them to the Ship. The mean while, Felicia, oppress'd with Sorrow, continu'd "lamenting with Inea; I have no Hopes left, faid fhe to her; my Fate is decreed; the ungrateful Count of La Vagne is now going off, and I shall lose him for ever; he flies me, and carries with him the Object of his Love; the Barbarian cou'd fee me dying without being touch'd; nay, he even deny'd me his Pity; and the deplorable Condition, that perfidious Man has reduc'd me to, 'has not cost him a Sigh. Ah! leave me, and let me die with Grief, and Shame! Don't indulge your Affliction, Madam, interrupted Inea; think only, that he who leaves you, is unworthy of the Tears you fned; reflect on his Ingratitude, and it will be an effectual Way to forget him. You are deceived, if

if you believe it, faid Felicia fighing ; when one is infpir'd with a Paffion, the Lots of its Object wholly employs our Thoughts. I pro-test to you with some Confusion, that all the good Qualities I knew in that inconftant Lover, appear to me now with greater Luftre, tho' I can no longer doubt of his Infidelity, or my Misfortune; and to let you fee more of my. Weaknefs, I have a preffing Defire to write to him, in Hopes my Reproaches might move him. What, Madam! interrupted Inea, cou'd you receive his Devoirs again, after fuch an injurious Proceeding ? Alas, reply'd Felicia, what are not we capable of acting to recall a Heart, whofe Poffession is dear to us? Then don't add to my Pain; I too well comprehend what you think, and blush to see my Honour concern'd : But confider, I am an unhappy distracted Creature : My Dear, I conjure you, in the Name of your faithful Don Ramire, to find fome Perfon, that will deliver a Letter to the Count of La Vagne; you cannot confer a greater Obligation on me. Inea, who was very willing to ferve Felicia, left her immediately, in order to make an Attempt; but foon after fhe return'd, and told her, it was impoffible to fend any Body to the Port, that the Queen had either receiv'd News of Ifmael's Approach, or that fomething extraordinary was paffing at Court, fince fhe had command-ed the Guards of her Palace to be doubled, and the Gates to be flut, that none might be admitted without her Order.

Then

- Then I must lose all Hopes, (cry'd unfortunate Felicia,) for I can neither ftop him, nor follow him. Just Heaven! revenge me on that perjur'd Man! punish his Perfidiousness! punish the Cause of this last Misfortune! may the angry Waves fwallow them up, and let me hear the News of their Lofs, foon after that of their Departure! But alas, am I capable of forming Wilhes fo contrary to my Inclination? No, I have lov'd the Count too well ever to hate him; then let him live and be happy. All my Fury ought to be turn'd against my felf, for I deferve the Miferies I now linger in. Had I, inftead of leaving my Father's House, submitted to his Commands, I shou'd not at prefent have the cruel Mortification, of reproaching my felf with an imprudent Conduct, which I never shall be able to justify to the World. While Felicia is thus deploring the Cruelty of her Fortune, we must return to the Prince of Carency.

Cafilda had malicioufly perfwaded him, that Benavidez was gone with Leonida to Jaen, where he wou'd be fure (as fhe faid) of the Governour's Protection. A Man muft certainly have as much Valour, as Love, to attempt any thing against a Perfon, who was protected by the Governour of fo confiderable a Place; but the Violence of his Passion, and Extremity of his Despair together, wou'd not permit him to reflect, even on the greatest of Dangers.

OF CARENCY.

Where-ever he país'd, People obferv'd fomething extraordinary in him and tho' his Eyes express'd much Grief, his Noble Mein carry'd Marks of the Higheft Diftinction. He made the fricteft Enquiry after Felicia of Leon; whom fometimes he call'd Leonida of Velafco, but when he defcrib'd her to those he apply'd to, he was fo lavish in her Praise, that they easily discover'd he was her Lover.

Notwithstanding all his Care'and Diligence, his Pursuit was in vain, for she had not pass'd that Way, nor cou'd any one give him the least Intelligence concerning her. He began to be very uneafy, and hurrying from one Thought to another, his Mind was fill'd with his past Misfortunes, till he came to Jaen, where he arriv'd exceeding melancholy. He look'd on the Citadel of that Town as a Place, where his Life and Difasters were to be terminated. Here, faid he! here, I expect to fee the ungrateful Beauty I adore, and before her Eyes, I will attack the ungenerous Man, who next her felf had the first Place in my Heart. What a strange Destiny is this, cry'd he? My Mistrefs and my Friend equally betray me, and to fatisfy my Refentment, I must destroy the One, to wound the Other. It is probable, they are this fatal Hour contriving my Ruin, and giving each other fresh Affurances of eternal Love; but my Death must confirm their Felicity, for whilft I am living, they have a cruel Enemy, who will endeavour to defeat their Projects, and ever trouble the Happineis they propofe, At

At his Arrival, he had a mind to go directly to the Citadel, for (as I told you before) he had accepted of a Letter from the Governour of Carmona, to his Son Don Gabriel d'Aguillar, by whole Intereft he was fure of an cafy Entrance into the Place; but he thought it was better first to fend to him, and the mean Time inform himfelf of what pafs'd there. As he was going thro' the Town, he met a French Chevalier of the Houfe of Boucicault; his Name was Alphonso, a Person'of an obliging Temper, who came to Seville with the Count of La March. What do' I fee? Is it you, my Lord, (cry'd he, coming up to the Prince, with a great deal of Joy and Refpect ;) are you living, whom we formuch lamented with the Prince your Brother, believing you were affassinated near Carmona, as it was reported in Spain, and for which we were meditating a proportionable Revenge? I shou'd have been happy, my Dear Alphonso, (faid the Prince) had my Enemy's Defigns been effected, but I am referv'd for greater Calamities; yet I defire my Name may be kept fecret, for important Reafons, which engage me to conceal it, and you can be very ferviceable to me. I am in love, and betray'd, and must revenge my felf on my Rival and my Mistress. Oh! how I shall load Felicia with my just Reproaches? She is now in the Citadel with him. What you fay is true, my Lord, interrupted Alphonso, I know it from Don Gabriel d Aguillar, who is one of my particular Friends: Feli-

Felicia is confin'd against her Will, in an Apartment where she fees no Body, but by the Means of the Spanish Captain I have already mentioned; one Night, without being perceiv'd, I faw her fadly deploring her Fate. Oh! my Lord, how Young and Handsom she is; I must confess, I extremely pity her.

Do you pity her, faid the Prince with a deep Sigh? Have you any Compassion for her? Ah! you are little acquainted with her Perfidioufnefs; but tell me, what means that manner of Confinement? Did not you see her come here with Don Fernand Benavidez, the Governour's Nephew? No, reply'd Alphonso, the Person you name has not appear'd here fince my Arrival, for as I am every Day at the Citadel, I shou'd probably have seen him; yet if he be there, he certainly keeps himfelf conceal'd, Ah, the Traitor! cry'd the Prince, he is only hid for Felicia's fake, and without doubt has defir'd a Guard to protect him from my Re-fentment. The Villain has fufficient Reafon to fear me; it is dangerous to infult a defperate Man who does not value his Life. This Thought made the Prince fly into fo violent a Paffion, that Alphonfo beg'd of him to retire from the Place where they were ftanding, for fear they might be observ'd.

The Prince faid to him, if you will prevent my committing any Extravagancies, you muft fecond the Defire I have of feeing Benavidez, and Felicia. I have a Letter for Don Gabriel d Aguillar, who I am glad to hear is your Friend; Friend ; you will oblige me extremely in fending inftantly to him, that we may take neceffary Measures for that purpose. Alphonso promis'd the Prince every thing that depended on him, even at the Hazard of his Life, then left him to execute his Orders.

Whatever Enquiry Alphonso and Don Gabriel made, before they came to the Prince, they cou'd learn nothing fatisfactory; those to whom they apply'd concerning Don Fernand Benavidez told 'em, they believ'd he was at Villa Real, but that he was not Nephew to Don Alonzo Fajardo, and that no body had feen him at Jaen, where hardly any one knew him. When they brought this Account to the Prince, he could not believe 'em. Since Felicia is in the Citadel, interrupted he, 'tis a certain Consequence Benavidez is not far; do you only contrive that I enter her Apartment; it is likely he will come there when every body is retired. Don Gabriel told him he fhou'd be obey'd; then went to receive Orders from the Governour, who named him for Felicia's Guard; at Night he came back to the Prince, to conduct him and Alphonso to the Citadel.

Now can any Mortal imagine the Trouble this amorous Prince was in, when he thought, he was fure to fee the Object he ftill ador'd; he refolv'd his Rival fhou'd perifh, tho' he himfelf were to fall with him; which violent Reflection made him figh deeply, efpecially when he confider'd that this fame Felicia was was Leonida of Velasco, to whom he was fo ftrictly engag'd, that his Honour wou'd not fuffer any other to carry her off.

He was in this Confusion of Thought, where Love and Revenge were equally concern'd, when Don Gabriel conducted him through feveral Courts, till at last he brought him to the Tower, where Felicia was conceal'd in a low, Apartment; the Windows were bar'd with Iron-Grates, and the Weather being exceffive hot, fhe had obtain'd leave to walk on the Leads of the Tower for the Air ; the Prince took that Opportunity to enter a Clofet, which was only fhut with a Glafs Door, and there hid himfelf behind the Window Curtain, from whence he could fee all that paffed. He was not there long; before the Lights were taken away, and he heard two Perfons creep into the Clofet ; they fpoke very low, and the Night being dark, he could not diftinguish whether they were Men or Women; foon after, they went out of the Clofet, where the Prince thought himfelf alone, but the Lights being brought in again, he faw feveral Women, who were preparing a Bath. They hung a Canopy of rofecolour'd Sattin, embroider'd with Silver, over a large black Marble Veffel, which they fill'd with Water and Flowers, mix'd with the fineft Perfumes.

Every thing being ready, a Lady came in, to whom the reft of the Women shewed much Respect, but he could not see her Face, her Head being covered with a fine Veil; this was Felicia, who having undressed her felf to

270

a thin Night-Gown, ordered all her Women to retire, excépting Zaida; then called for her Lute, faying, Mufick only can footh my dear Afflictions. Ah! Zaida, Zaida, could he for whom I fuffer, hear thefe Verfes, how pleafed fhould I be! Soon after fhe fung the enfuing Words, with fo fweet a Voice, that none cou'd hear her without being inchanted.

WHI shou'd Virtue thus torment me, Oh! unkind and cruel Law? Or why shou'd fantastick Duty Strike my tender Heart with Awe?

Love, take pity of my Anguish, To my soft Distress be kind : Never let the fair One languish When to Tenderness inclin'd.

She repeated the laft Stanza feveral times, and fetch'd now and then deep Sighs, which fhew'd her Heart was poffefs'd with a mighty Paffion, as well as exceffive Grief. The Prince all this while perceiv'd it was not the Voice of his unconftant Felicia, or at leaft was furpriz'd, that the finall diftance which was between them fhou'd caufe fo great an Alteration in her Tone, as not to know it again. Do not afflict your felf, Madam, faid Zaida; great Paffions are ever influenc'd by Fortune; he whom you love, is at prefent inform'd of what you fuffer; do you think he will attempt nothing of CARENCY. 271.

nothing to evince you of his Affection? Felicia made no Reply, but order'd her to shut her Chamber Door, and went into the Bath. How entirely do I love you, cruel Leonida, faid the amorous Prince to himfelf? But Oh. ungrateful Woman! ought not I to be asham-ed of my Weakness? For let me look upon you as a Perfon to whom I am contracted. or as a Mistress I love to Distraction, you have equally deceiv'd me under the Titles of Carency, and La Vagne. Ah, perfidious Creature ! you are now propoling to furmount all Difficulties, in order to marry Benavidez : Cou'd' there be a Complaint more passionate, than that which you just now utter'd ? But (continued he) what must I believe ? Are her Defigns travers'd ? Here, I fee her a Prifoner in a. Place where she thought to find a Sanctuary ; fhe: even regrets the Absence of her Lover, and every thing feems to difappoint their Expectations.

Ctations. Such were the Prince's Reflections, and in fpite of his Refentment, Love still triumph'd in his Heart; but in what furprize was he, when Zaida opening the Door of another Clofet, he drew the Curtain, and faw a Man going with Precipitation to the bathing Veffel, where he put himfelf on his Knees, and fpoke fo low, that his Voice cou'd not reach the Prince, who only heard Felicia cry aloud, is it you, my dear Lover; then she swooned away.

The

The Prince of Carency, feeing this, cou'd no longer refrain, but without thinking on the Confequence of the Scene he was going to open, ran out of the Clofet like a Madman, and had he been capable of taking any bafe Advantage, it was in his power to run him (he took for Benavidez) thro' the Body, before the other cou'd even put himfelf in a Posture of Defence; for Felicia's Swoon had fuch an extraordinary Effect upon him, that he did not fee the Prince, who was just at his Back, till hearing fome body threatening him with a furious Tone, he rofe and drew his Sword ; but the Prince feeing his Face, immediately drop'd the Point of his, knowing him to be Don Alenzo, eldeft Son to the Infanta Don Fernand ; he had feen him at Seville, when he was there with his Brother, the Count of La March; and the fine Qualities of this young Prince had engag'd the Prince of Carency to have a greatEsteem for him ; he cast his Eyes on her, whom he took for Leonida, and knew her to be Dona Felicia d'Ayala, Daughter to the Great Chancellor of Castille, who was highly diftiguish'd by his Birth, and renown'd for the Histories of Don Pedro, and Don Henriquez, Kings of Spain, which he had written. This Grandee being dead, Felicia was brought up with the two Princeffes,. Daughters to the Infanta Don Fernand. Don' Alonzo, who faw her often, conceiv'd fo great a Passion for her, that every one suspected he wou'd marry her privately, and to prevent for unequal a Match, whilft Don Alonzo was one SIL Day

Day a hunting, the Infanta his Father had order'd, that Felicia shou'd befecretly conveyed to Jaen, where she was to be carefully guarded: All the Women who attended her were at the Infanta's Devotion, and by the Death of the Chancellor her Father she was delivered up entirely to the Perfecutions of those, who envy'd her. As for Zaida, the was a Slave, whom Felicia had made a Christian, and one they did not mistrust, not reflecting she had been prefented to her by Don Alonfo. This young Prince, at his Return to Seville, was in a defpairing Condition, when he heard his Miftrefs was gone; and tho' he learn'd but very confufedly, the Manner of her being carry'd off, and confin'd in a ftrong Place, yet invited by his Paffion, he Day and Night us'd his utmost Endeavour to recover her; having at last discover'd his dear Felicia's Concealment, and found Means to write to Zaida, who answer'd his Letter, the Affair was fo well manag'd, that without Felicia's Knowledge, he got into her Apartment.

The Prince of Carency perceiving his Error, in order to repair it, prefented Don Alonfo with his Sword, the Point towards his own Breaft; Punifh an unhappy Man, faid he, whom you will oblige, in taking away his Life. By my Words, you may judge of the Concern I am in, for having diffurb'd this charming Interview, which to obtain, it's probable, my Lord, you have expos'd your felf to fome Danger; but be affur'd, I fuffer more T 274 than you thro' this Miftake. I do not refent it in the leaft, my Lord, (reply'd Don Alonzo, embracing him) and if you will promife to keep this Secret, you fhall ever find me a grateful Friend. The Prince of Carency gave him his Word, he wou'd never take the leaft Notice of what had happen'd, and without flaying till Felicia was come to her felf, he left the Chamber in fo deep a Defpair, that he cou'd fearcely fpeak to Gabriel d'Aguilar, who was at the Door of the firft Room, with Alphonfo, and this laft attended him to Don Gabriel's Apartment, who was oblig'd to remain in his Poft.

The Prince having an Opportunity of yielding himfelf up to his just Sorrow, call'd to mind all his Misfortunes, from his first appearing in the World, to that Moment ; on whatever Side he turn'd his Eyes, he faw fo little Hopes of an Intermission, that every thing became indifferent to him, and he did not even wish himself a better Fortune. All his Thoughts were fix'd on being reveng'd of Benavidez, which he fancy'd was the only Satisfaction he cou'd receive; but as it appear'd almost impossible, it extremely added to his Grief. Oh, Alphonfo ! faid he, can any Difappointment be equal to this? I was in Hopes to punish a Traitor, and recover my Mistres; but that fatal Name of Felicia has again deceived me. What unaccountable Circumstances have attended my Life? Fate has fingled me amongst all Mankind to be unfortunate.

tunate. Where must I go to find the Treafure I have lost? Alas, my Leonida is not here, and I difcover too late, Cafilda's wicked Plot. How cou'd I believe, that the wou'd have told me where her Brother was gone? If I had made the least Reflection, I might have expected the wou'd deceive me. Ah! Credulous Wretch that I was, I have lost an Opportunity I thall never retrieve again. Just Heaven! my Rival is now fafe with Leonida, and he peaceably enjoys a Bleffing which belongs to me. Can I after this furvive my Shame and Defpair? In thort, the Prince's Condition was fuch, that nothing cou'd give him Relief; his Complaints were moving, and Love appear'd in all his Actions.

Alphonfo, who knew by Experience the Torments, that attend transcendent Passions, extremely pity'd this unhappy Prince; Oh Love! cry'd he, will you never cease perfecuting us? You alone cause all our Missortunes, and never grant a Favour that is not preceded by a Thousand Disappointments. Ah! Why have we no Fence against your Power? The Prince, whils he was talking, continued in a deep Silence; and Alphonfo finding he was not dispos'd to converse with him, meditated some time, then wrote these Verses.

LOVE, thou dear, but cruel Tyrant, Can nothing move thee to be kind? Hear my Sighs and see my Torment, For only Thou canst ease my Mind. T 2. 275

The PRINCE

Since all are doom'd to feel thy Darts, At least suspend our Pains, With tender Pity bless those Hearts That languish in thy Chains.

The Prince read these Lines, and faid, One cou'd have no room to complain, if, in Love, there were an equal mixture of Pleasure and Pain ; but alas ! I have experienc'd that all its Ills are referv'd for me, which makes me with a Period to my unhappy Life. Ah, my Lord! interrupted Alphonfo, do not harbour a Thought fo offenfive to your Courage. 'Tis unworthy a Soul fo great as your's fhou'd yield to a Paffion, which will divert you from the Performance of great Exploits. The Prince blush'd at what Alphonso said, and look'd on this Difcourfe, as a Reproach made him, for the time he had employ'd in entertaining his amorous Sentiments; You shall fee by my Conduct, reply'd he, that my Soul is ftill my own : I love, 'tis true, and cannot flatter myfelf with ever being difengag'd from a Paffion, which has fo great an Empire over me; yet when Honour calls me I am ready to attend; and if I must give up my Life it shall be in so glorious a way as will do Honour to my Name.

Here they where both filent fome time, till the Prince, urg'd by difagreeable Thoughts, broke out into his ufual Complaints: Oh, Alphonfo! faid he, which way fhall I direct my Courfe to find Leonida? I cannot hear where the fhe is; must I then turn Knight-Errant, and run through the World, without knowing where to go? No, I have a nobler Refolution; I will return to Seville, and there follow my Brother's Fortune; if we engage the Moors, I must conquer, or bravely die.

Alphonso over-joy'd to hear the Prince speak in these Terms, applauded a Design so worthy of him. Confider, my Lord, faid he, that all you cou'd do at present for Leonida, wou'd meet with no Return; for fince she flies you, tis proable, you are the Object of her Aver-fion; at least, her going off with Benavidez is a Proof, she loves him, and is perfidious to you: What can you then expect from her ? Rather strive to deface the Impression she has made, that in time you may even lofe the Remembrance of having ever known her. I ought to take your Advice indeed, interrupted the Prince, but alas! how is it possible? Fortune may be inconftant, but my Heart can ne-ver change. Thus irrefolute, not knowing what to determine, he conjur'd Alphonso not to difcover who he was, nor acquaint the Count of La March with his being at Jaen, till he had fix'd a Refolution. The Chevalier promis'd him upon Honour to keep the Secret inviolably, and beg'd he wou'd not be uneafy on that Subject.

Whilft thefe things pass'd in relation to the Prince of Carency, the Count of La March, his Brother, neglected no opportunity of fignalizing himfelf. He had not been long at Seville, when T 3

when the Moors befieg'd Baëca with Seven Thoufand Horfe, and a Hundred Thoufand Foot; fo formidable an Army ftruck Terror throughout Andalusia, but as the Place was well fortify'd, the Moors despair'd of its Reduction, when they receiv'd Advice, that the Spaniards from all parts were affembled in order to relieve it; therefore they fuddenly retir'd, loaded with the Plunder of the Neighbouring Villages. They were not more fortunate at Sea, where they had confiderable Loffes by the Spanish Fleet, which had engag'd their's, and gain'd a compleat Victory. This Advantage gave no finall Satisfaction to the Spaniards, who now thought of acting offenfively. The Infanta call'd a General Council of all the Officers of the Army, where it was refolv'd to besiege Zahara. The besieg'd defended the Town bravely, till the want of Necessaries made 'em capitulate. Soon after, he took another of their strongest Places, which fo exafparated Mahomet King of Granada, that he immediately thought on Revenge; and in order to carry on his Defign, put himfelf at the Head of Six Thousand Horse, and Eighty Thousand Foot, dividing them into feveral Bodies, which took different Routs for their March, and all on a fudden befieg'd Jaen, whilft they thought him imploy'd elfewhere.

His Approach furpriz'd the Governour, who was not prepar'd for a Siege, and wou'd have been under greater Difficulties, were he not affifted by the Prince of Carency, who had not yet left left the Town, and was rejoye'd to have for fine an Occasion of distinguishing himself. He had been prefented to Alonzo Fajardo under the Title of Count of La Vagne, and having offer'd his Services to him, the other readily accepted of 'em. This young Prince put himfelf at the Head of a Detachment, and by his frequent Sallies, often broke the Enemies Meafures, and repuls'd 'em where ever he appear'd, carrying Death and Terror along with him. As his Neglect of Life made him expose himself to the greatest Dangers, he became dreadful to his Enemies, who knowing him by his Arms, chofe rather to avoid his Blows than resist him. The Governour of Faen admired his Courage, and thought Heaven had fent him to defend that City against the Infidels.

The King of the Moors enrag'd at his ill Succefs, and attributing the Caufe to the Prince of Carency, whom they call'd the Knight of the black Arms, order'd fome of the braveft of his Army, either to kill, or take him Prifoner; fo immediately the General's and most of the Noblemen made a League to be reveng'd of this terrible Enemy, or perifh in the Attempt. A Detachment was fent out the next Day, much fuperior to that under the Prince's Command. Nevertherlefs he attack'd them, and his Courage furpafs'd all that can be imagin'd. The Moors were beginning to repent their rafh Undertaking, when unluckily the Prince's Horfe was wounded by an Arrow; and before he cou'd difengage himfelf, they T 4 rufh'd rush'd upon him with a Shout, and took him Prifoner. This News ran thro' the Camp, and foon found way into the Town, where it had a different Effect; Mahomet thought now he had conquer'd, and the Governour believ'd himfelf overcome. The Barbarians were refolv'd to make a general Affault, and the Christians were preparing to defend themfelves, tho' most of the Soldiers were mightily dishearten'd, faying to one another, what can we pretend to? We have lost the Count of La Vagne; commanded by him, we might have defeated our Enemies, but his Misfortune is the Prefage of ours.

At this time the Infanta omitted nothing for the Succour of Jaen: He affembled his Troops with great Diligence, and march'd towards the Town with the Count of La March, where he furpriz'd the Moors, who retir'd with more Shame than Glory, fatisfying themfelves with burning, and pillaging, wherever they pafs'd. The Spaniards purfu'd them as far as Malaga, which they befieg'd in their turn. The Infanta was inform'd by Don Alonfo Fajardo, of the young Count of La Vagne's being taken Prifoner by Mahomet; as for his Friend Alphonfo, he was kill'd in one of the Engagements, which was the Caufe that the Count of La March heard nothing of the Prince of Carency's being there. The mighty Character of his Bravery, and the Recital of the great Actions he had perform'd, gave the Infanta a particular Concern for his Misfortune; he fent an Officer with Propofals for the Exchange of Prifoners, and offer'd a Ranfom for the Count of La Vagne, being willing to purchafe his Liberty at any rate; but all he cou'd do to get him out of his Enemies Power was in vain; the Moors made Anfwer, that the Count having brib'd his Guards, had made his Efcape, and that were he full in their Hands, they wou'd readily fend him back, to fhew how defirous they were to oblige the Infanta.

The King of Granada in the mean time was of Opinion, that he cou'd not too ftrictly guard a Perfon, who had been very troublefome to him during the Siege; therefore Policy and Revenge having an equal share in this Defign, he order'd that the Prince (tho' dangeroufly wounded) fhou'd be convey'd to the Caftle of Solobrena, where his Brother, Prince Joseph, with his two Sons, Mahomet and Ofmin, were kept Prifoners ; fo the Prince of Carency found himfelf a fecond time in the Power of the Infidels; but his Sentiments were quite different from those he had at Nicopolis, for that which at another time wou'd have given him much Chagrin, had now very little Effect on him, all his Thoughts being only imploy'd on Leonida, and every thing elfe below his Confideration; yet it was an unhappy State, for a Man to love an Object, whom he Thought guilty of the greatest Perfidiousness. Whilft this was the State of Affairs in Upper Audalusia and Murcia, Celima Queen of Fez Fez was taking Meafures to be reveng'd of Abelhamar. Felicia had but juft oblig'd him to leave her Chamber, when the Queen (impatient to have her Defigns executed) caus'd him to be feiz'd by a Captain of her Guards, who carry'd him immediately to a Tower adjoyning the Palace, and having pofted a Guard at every Gate to hinder People from coming near, the Queen went to him foon after.

Abelhamar did not appear the least furpriz'd at his Confinement; he faid to this Princefs, My Sentiments, Madam, are not unknown to you, fince you are inform'd of the Love I have for Felicia; I have not acted any thing contrary to the Allegiance and Refpect I owe you, and tho' you find me difguis'd in your Palace, it wou'd not confift with Justice, to draw an ill Confequence from an Action, that is only the Effect of my Passion, to which you can impute no other Crime, but that of Indifcretion. I know too well your Intentions (interrupted the Queen in a fierce Tone) to let myfelf be deceiv'd by your Wit, or Meta-morphofis; No, Prince! you were here confpiring against me; the rebellious Principles you were brought up in, cou'd never receive a grateful Sentiment, or teach you what you owe your Sovereign. Have I not preferv'd your Life, without regard to the Reasons of State, which ought to have induced me to facrifice you ? Yet, ungrateful as you are! have you liv'd hitherto with the hopes of making 797 me me a Victim? Cruel Ismael also feconds your Defign, and has promis'd you Forces in order to dethrone me. You prefer a Stranger to a Queen of your own Blood, to whom you owe every thing; but Heaven that protects me, has put me in a Condition to punish you, and be reveng'd of my Enemies. Satisfy yourfelf, Madam, (reply'd the Prince, with a haughty Air) and don't flight fo fine an Opportunity of taking away a Life, which is odious to you. Paint my Innocence in the vileft Colours, or rather, fay, the legal Right I have to the Crown you wear, is my only Crime; and that, as you have ever born an invincible hatred to the unhappy Remainders of my Family, you have refolv'd to compleat, what your unjust Father had begun. Rash Man! cry'd Celima, do you think of what you are faying? Dare you pronounce thefe Words before the Queen your Mistrefs? Don't you know your Death waits my Command? Is it thus you endeavour to justify your felf, and appease me? You don't consider the Danger you are in. Abelhamar made no Reply to her Threats, nor gave the least Attention to her whilst she was speaking, but rather acted like one, who defpiling Mercy, did not regret the Life he was going to be depriv'd of; which unconcern'd Behaviour furpriz'd the Queen, who retired full of Refentment.

Celima had already given orders, that Felicia and Inea fhou'd be fittictly guarded in their Chambers, and that none of their Companions fhou'd fhou'd be admitted to them. This new Misfortune did not add to Felicia's Concern, for every thing was now become fo indifferent to her, that fhe did not even enquire into the Caufe.

The Queen being return'd to the Palace, call'd her Council, and appointed Perfons to examine the Prince, because she wou'd shew fome Form in an Affair, which might draw upon her the Aversion of her Relations, and particularly that of the Maliquez Alabez, who were also descended from the antient Kings of Fez, and at that time very potent in the King-dom of Granada. This induc'd her to give the blackeft Colours to the Crime, with which they were going to charge Abelhamar; and tho' fhe took the best Measures to conceal the Defign she had against him, yet his faithful Mula (who was just return'd from Tunis, where he had carry'd Credentials to Ismael from the Prince, us'd his utmost Application to ferve him; he had too good a Correspondence in the Palace, not to be inform'd of every thing that pass'd there, in relation to the unfortunate Prince; and as he perceiv'd the occafion was preffing, he wou'd lofe no time to give immediate affistance to his Master, who otherways wou'd fall a Sacrifice to Celima. He went to all Abelhamar's Friends and Slaves, and prepar'd them to affemble, in order to raife the City in his Favour; by which means, he hoped to restore him to his Liberty, or put all to Fire and Sword, that wou'd oppofe it. Thefe were were his Refolutions, till he reflected, that the Queen had a great many Creatures devoted to her/Service, as well as a ftrong Garrifon, and that the People being us'd to her Government, wou'd ftrive to maintain it; therefore he thought it more prudent to return to Tunis, and apply himfelf to Ifmael, who wou'd imploy his utmost Power in this important Affair; fo he fet out again from Sallee, and foon arriv'd at Ifmael's Court.

His Grief and Affection furnish'd him with Expressions of so great a Force, that the King of Tunis was extreamly touch'd at Abelbamar's Misfortunes, and being already exasperated against Celima, he resolv'd immediately to assist that Prince. With this Intent, he order'd his Troops to be drawn out of their Garrisons and review'd, then sent an Ambassador to the King of Morocco, to renew his Treaty of Alliance with him, to prevent that Prince in his Absence from making any Irruptions into his Territories.

After having difpos'd every thing with as much Wifdom as Diligence, he open'd the Campaign, and Mula return'd privately to Sallee, to perform what he had first refolv'd for the Safety of his Master.

The young Prince being examin'd, refus'd at first to make a Reply; but when they told him, unlefs he answer'd to the Accusation, he shou'd receive Sentence the sooner, it oblig'd him to make a Defence, in Expectation of being reliev'd by Ismael; and whatever mind the Queen had to forward his Tryal, she cou'd not not proceed to a Condemnation, without expofing herfelf to inevitable Dangers. The first Officers of the Crown, and Lords of the Court represented to her, that she cou'd not take too much Precaution in an Affair of this Importance, and that it wou'd be more to her Glory, to let Clemency take Place of Justice; we believe the Prince is culpable, faid they, fince he was found difguis'd in the Palace, which is a fufficient Proof; yet without Regard to his Youth, as he is prefumptive Heir to the Crown, and of your Blood, Madam, he ought to have fome Refpect fhewn him; therefore we beg, that your Majesty, for your own Interest, will confider these Reasons feparately, and by fufpending your Refentment, fhew Mercy to the Prince.

The Queen was difpleas'd at a Requeft, which fhew'd, that Abelhamar had more Friends than fhe imagin'd; and fearing they fhou'd take Meafures to refcue her Prifoner, fhe wou'd no longer confult Reafon, but refolv'd to do every thing by her own Authority, without taking any Advice of her Council; fo having prevented those appointed to judge the Prince, fhe herfelf pronounc'd the Sentence of his Death; and to deter feditious Persons from caballing against her, fhe order'd, that he fhou'd be executed on the Plat-Form of the Court wherein he was confin'd, that every Body might fee him fuffer.

In this Place they built a Scaffold hung with Mourning, and fet round with Standards and and Scutcheons, which with other difinal Preparations drew Numbers of Spectators. The Prince was foon after inform'd of his Fate: this News at first very much furpriz'd him; his Eyes exprefs'd an extraordinary Grief, and he was fome time without speaking; at last lifting up his Hands, Oh Heaven! he cry'd, you know my Difguife was not criminal, and that this is only a pretext the unjust Queen takes to destroy me; but fince you have decreed my Doom, I am ready to obey without repining; and if Celima grants me one Favour, I shall die with Content. Then turning himfelf to the Captain of the Guards, he faid, go tell the Queen from me, that I beg leave to bid an eternal Adieu to charming Felicia; the Minutes I shall pass with her will be too fhort to retard the inhuman Defigns of Celima.

The Officer went directly to the Queen, who was very unwilling to grant the Prince his Requeft; but her Ministers having represented to her in respectful Terms, how cruel it wou'd be to refuse fo small a Satisfaction to a Person in his Condition, the at last confented that Felicia shou'd be brought to him. She was till then a Stranger to the Prince's Misfortune, being strictly confin'd with Inea; and as her Confinement did not in the least disturb her, the never enquired, why they added this new Rigour to her Captivity. Her Mind was entirely taken up with the Count of La Vagne; and the Tears she shed were only for his Inconstancy and Absence; every thing else that happen'd, 10 happen'd, had no Effect on her; and fhe was in this Difposition, when the was fent for by the Queen's Orders. She follow'd the Governefs of the Slaves without asking any Queftion; Inea fupported her, and being very weak after her Illnefs, it was with a vaft deal of Difficulty, that the reach'd the Tower.

The first Object that struck her Sight was the Scaffold, and a Number of Guards, which gave her room to believe, that fhe was going to be a Victim to Celima's Jealoufy. Inea's Thoughts were the fame, which extremely terrify'd her. Felicia's Sentiments were different from hers; for tho' Death appear'd hard to her, yet ihe had fome fort of Satisfaction, in feeing the approaching End of her Misfortunes. Take Courage, my dear Inea, (faid fhe, embracing her with a great deal of Tendernefs,) the Danger only regards me, and I look upon it with Indifferency; it is a Remedy my Prefervation commanded me not tofeek, but fince it is my Fate, I receive it with Pleafure. I am going to die, and shall no longer have a Sense of my Calamities. No, Lovely Felicia! (cry'd the Prince, who was near enough to hear what she faid,) you are not to die; this Punishment is prepard for unfortune Abelhamar, who now takes his last leave of you; I proteft it lefs concerns me, to lofe my Life in fo shameful a manner, than to want Affurances of your Favour. Ah Madam! (added he with an Air full of Love and Grief) can you refuse me a Look, a Sigh, or or a favourable Word? You fee I perifh, and my Misfortune proceeds from your transcendent Charms! The Defire I had to see you reign, made me endeavour to ascend the Throne, from which my Father fell; you inspir'd me with an Ambition, I shou'd have manag'd better, had I been less in Love; You are the innocent Cause of the Disguise I am reproached with, which is thought my Crime; yet I have nothing to repent of, since my Passion invites me to bear the Cruelty of my Fate. But at least, give me leave, divine Felicia, to believe that had myDesign succeeded, myRespect and Perfeverance wou'd have made fome Impression on you. Only approve these Thoughts, and I shall not think much to purchase fo dear a Profession, with the Loss of my Life.

Felicia at thefe Words was fo diforder'd, that fhe look'd fome time at Abelhamar, without having Power to fpeak. She was touch'd with a fincere Compassion, and deplor'd the Misfortune of this young Prince, who was going to be facrific'd fo ignominiously. She cou'd have wish'd, the Queen's Refentment had fallen on her; for the State of her Affairs with the Count of La Vagne was fuch, as had render'd Life fo insupportable to her, that shad render'd Life fo insupportable to her, that the feem'd very willing to refign it. At last, perceiving Abelhamar waited her Answer; she faid, is this Scene prepar'd for you, my Lord? Alas! why cannot I relieve you? My Tears are the only Proofs, I can give of my true Concern; yet be assured, I shall never be U fo fo ungrateful, as to forget your Favours. This Day's Difaster will ever be before my Eyes. Ah Felicia! (reply'd the Prince) I thought your Compassion wou'd have inspired me with Courage, but I find it has a contrary Influence. Oh! That I cou'd now live for you: The Hopes you have given me, make me ex-treamly regret leaving you, fince I must leave you for ever. Here, his Breast was oppress'd with fo deep a Sorrow, that he could only express it by his repeated Sighs. The Queen, who was impatient to have the Prince executed, had order'd, that Felicia shou'd be call'd away from him, when of a fudden fhe was alarm'd, hearing at the Gates of the Palace, the Shouts and Cries of People in Arms, who were comanded by valiant Mula, and had already charg'd the Soldiers of the Guard. They demanded the Prince, and threatned Celima with a general Revolt, unanimoufly calling Abelhamar their King, and faying, they had caufe to fear a Queen, who was cruel enough to wash her Hands in the Blood of her nearest Relation; and that if fhe deny'd their Requeft, they wou'd deliver her up to the Punishment, which she had design'd for the Prince.

The Queen wou'd not have given much Attention to the Menaces of thefe feditious People, had the not been inform'd, that there were thick Clouds of Duft feen towards the Road of Tunis, and that the Centinels (who had already heard a confus'd Noife of warlike Inftruments) began to difcover from the Walls of the Town, a Body of Men marching with great Precipitation; foon after they came to acquaint her, that there was a Herald at the Gate, who defired Admittance to her Majefty, in the Name of Ifmael. This News firuck the Queen with Terror, which fhe express'd by her Emotions, being divided between Revenge and Defpair. Her Minifters prets'd her to give Audience to the King of Tituan's Herald, and after being a little composid, fne confented to fee him; he brought her a Letter, which was in these Terms.

I Am come to fuccour Abelhamar, who is a Prince favour d by Heaven, and our great Frophet Mahomet, therefore you must deliver him up to me. Confider, inhuman Queen, that you have neither Arms nor Subjects to support you: I am inform'd of every thing, that passes in the Palace, which I protest, I will reduce to Ashes, unless you immediately restore the Prince to his Liberty; but if you fend him to me, or Hostages for his Security, I will favour your Retreat; you may leave the Kingdom, and take with you such Attendance, as you shall think necessary.

Ismael Sultan.

Celima's Fortune cou'd hardly receive a greater Change; the now faw at the Gates of her Capital an Enemy, who treated her like a Conqueror, that was just going to dethrone her. The Soul of this imperious Princefs grew fo furious at Ifmael's Menaces, that inftead of thinking of the Danger the was in, her Mind U 2 was

was only taken up with Revenge. Come, cry'd she, Barbarian! Come and be Witness of my Courage and Refentment; the Man you intend to redeem, shall be facrifie'd before your Eyes. If Heaven and Earth shou'd joyn, and the E-lements return to their first Chaos; What is it to me? I have but a Life to lofe, which has been a Burthen to me these many Years ; let us go and firike off this rebellious Head, which is fo dear to Ifmael, and fend it to him from the Height of the Tower. Follow me (faid fhe, to the Herald, who waited her Anfwer;) come and fee, how I flight the Threats of your Mafter. You shall Witness the Death of Abelhamar, and receive his last Sighs. Ending thefe Words, she went hastily towards the Place, where her Commands were only expect-ed for his Execution; but, the Mufty, the Admiral, and Governour of the Town, with feveral of her faithful Subjects, flung them-felves at her Feet: Alafs, Madam! faid they, confider the Misfortune which feems to point at you perfonally; are you refolv'd to bury your felf in the Ruins of the Palace? That must certainly be your Fate, if you irritate a King, who is before your Walls with a potent Army;) this is no time, Madam, to revenge your felf ; for in puting the Prince to Death, it may raife a Mutiny, and fhou'd Ifmael take Advantage of it, you may lofe your Life, or be-come Captive to the Conqueror. Is it not more glorious, Madam, to fly and feek in another Country fome Forces, who, encourag'd banks the intervention of the participation by 2677

by your Prefence, may re-place you on your Throne?

The Queen's Women in Tears, proftrated themfelves at her Feet, and faid all that Zeal and Fearcou'd infpire; at laft her imperious Heart was touch'd, rather at the Danger file exposid fo many Perfons to, who depended on her, than at what concern'd her own Perfon. Muft the Queen of Fez fubmit, cry'd fhe, and feek her Safety in a fhameful Flight, which will caufe her to blufh the reft of her Days? Oh Heavens! Was ever Deftiny fo wretched as mine? I fhall become a Fugitive, and banifh'd my Kingdom, be fore'd to beg Refuge of thofe whom I once cou'd have protected; I cannot think I deferve fo cruel a Fate. Here, fhe continued her Complaints, and whilft fhe yielded to her exceffive Grief, Abelhamar was inform'd of the agreeable Change in his Fortune.

He was entertaining Felicia, when they came to tell him, that Ifmael's Ships and Forces were approaching. Think with what 'Tranfports he receiv'd this News! 'Tis now, Madam, faid he to her, that I can return the Goodnefs, youjuft now express'd; your Virtues have made a deep impression on me, and fince I am deliver'd from Death, you shall no longer feel the Weight of your Chains.' I rejoice, my Lord, reply'd Felicia, to see that the Danger is past, and conjure you, not to give your felf any Uneafiness about me: I am born to be unhappy, and the Rigour of my Captivity is nothing, when compard to my U 3 inward Pain: Farewel, my Lord; you have now Affairs of greater Importance to imploy your Thoughts. Finishing these Words, she retired, and Abelbamar remain'd in the Tower by Order of the Queen, who sent Hostages to Ifmael, with Affurances, that the Prince shou'd be fet at Liberty, as soon as she had left the City.

Unfortunate Celima was now preparing a Fleet and Transports to carry away her most valuable Goods : She gave Inftructions to those Persons, whom she could not take along with her, and having difpos'd every Thing according to her Intention, the made all imaginable Diligence to depart, not depending on Ifmael's Words, and fearing the Confequences of Abelbamar's Referement. Thus the Fugitive Queen went off by Night, with her Women and Slaves, and was conducted to the Veffel, which attended her. She order'd immediately to fet Sail with the reft of the Fleet, and the Wind being fair, they foon enter'd the Mediterranean. Nothing cou'd be equal to the Con-cern Celima was in for the loss of her Kingdom; she fetch'd deep Sighs, and in spight of all her Pride, cou'd not restrain her Tears. Fortune! Ungrateful Fortune! faid fhe, your Capricioufness spares neither King, nor Subject. Who can flatter himfelf with being above your Reach? You declar'd your felf my Enemy from my Infancy, and pursu'd me in the remetest Countries. Once taken by a Pyrate, I fell into the Power of Bajazet; foon after, you made use of Cupid's Arrows to pierce my Heart';

Heart; Alas! that Wound, I never can hope to cure ; at last, to shew your felf more favourable, you plac'd me on a Throne, which you now force me to abandon. What must I ex-pect from you next? Why don't you strike me at once with your most poison'd Darts, that I may not be expos'd to new Torments. Oh, deplorable Fate! shall I thus be for ever perfecuted ? And you Felicia, (continued fhe, cafting her melancholy Eyes on Leonida, who was near her) you are the Author of my last Misfortune; it is your fatal Beauty, that has been the occasion of this Revolution; Ah! how can you evince me, that you are inno-cent? Alas, Madam! reply'd Felicia, I had no Hand in the Prince's criminal Defigns; for if it be true, that he had a Passion for me, it was contrary to my Inclination: I knew nothing of his Difguise; nor did I ever flatter him with any Hopes. On the contrary, my A-verfion was the only Return I made to his Addresses, and from the first Hour he declar'd his Sentiments for me, I refolv'd never to change, I was inform'd, faid Celima, that the Count of La Vagne, who came to fetch away Olympia, had given you much Uneafinefs; without doubt, he is the Person you love, but you are convinc'd, he has no longer a Passion for you, and fince he has no Regard to your Affection, you ought to difdain him. Thefe Words put Felicia into fome Confusion, who blushing, cast down her Eyes, without being able to utter one Word, and her beauteous Checks U4

Cheeks moisten'd with Tears fufficiently exprefs'd the State of her anxious Soul. You make me no Answer (faid Celima, fetching a Sigh) Ah! I am better able to Answer for you; I was willing to fee, whether your Tongue cou'd betray your Heart, or difown a Distemper, you cannot cure. Alas, Felicia! I know too well by fatal Experience, the irrestiftible Power of Love, which unhappily furpriz'd me before I cou'd fupprefs its first Motions, or even think how dangerous they might prove,

If there are Torments in Love, Madam, faid Felicia, they ought not to affect a Sovereign, whom Nature hath grac'd with fuch transcen-dent Perfections. Nothing but Death, or Abfence can deprive you of the Object that is dear to you. Inconftancy, which furpasses either in Cruelty, can never make you feel the tormenting Effects of it. Ah, Felicia! reply'd Celima, there is no Pain like that, which is occafion'd by Abfence, fince it keeps us in continual Fears, both of Death and Infider lity. At leaft, Madam, faid Felicia, there is one Comfort in it, which is, that having but an uncertain knowledge of the Truth, we are generally inclin'd to believe what we most wish. No, continu'd Celima, it is not as you imagine; Uncertainty in Love is a Martyrdom, which adds to all the Pains we can endure. Alas, Madam ! reply'd Felicia, I fhou'd now look on that uncertain State, as a happy one, fince I might derive from it the pleafing Hopes, which my prefent Condition entirely deftroys.

The

The Sovereign and her Charming Slave were entertaining each other with Difcourfes of this Quality; and tho' Celima's Familiarity was very great, yet Felicia was ever mindful of the Refpect due to her. Night was far advanc'd before they took any Reft; but at laft their Eyes yielded to what Nature required, and Celima had been afleep fome Hours, when the was awak'd by the Noife of Seamen and Soldiers; the former were preparing against a Storm, which threaten'd 'em, and the latter for an Engagement with Abelhamar, whose Ships they had just difcover'd.

You must know that as foon as the Queen of Fez had fet out for the Kingdom of Granada, the Gates of Sallee and the Palace were open'd to the King of Tituan, who immediately went to the Tower, where the young Prince was Prifoner; but the latter being already fet at Liberty, he came to meet the King with the greateft Marks of Joy and Gratitude for his happy Deliverance. After Abelbamar had imploy'd fome time, in giving the King as obliging a Reception, as that Juncture wou'd permit, he cou'd not forbear going to the Apartment which belong'd to the Queen's Slaves, thinking to find Felicia there; for thofe who guarded him in his Confinement, had not inform'd him of her being embark'd with Celima.

But you may imagine how great was his Surprize, not to meet any Women there, and to fee every thing in Diforder: This giving him him fome Sufpicion, he proceeded to the Queen's Apartments, which were open and quite empty, fo that he had no longer room to doubt of the lofs of his Felicia. He ran up and down like a diftracted Man, and exprefs'd his exceflive Grief in fuch Terms, as extremely mov'd all that were with him. Have I then loft you, Felicia? cry'd he; my charming Felicia! have I loft you at a time, that I was flatter'd with the hopes of a perfect Felicity? The Compaffion you flew'd for me, when I was expecting immediate Death, was an Evincement of the Difpolition you were in to do me Justice, and had you not been compell'd to fly me, I am inclin'd to believe, you wou'd no longer refuse me your Affection. But Oh ! my Felicia, they have snatch'd you from me, and my raging Paffion is the only thing I have left in your cruel Abfence. Go Mula, continu'd he, go tell the King, he has done nothing for me; I am ready to give him up that Life, which he has preferv'd, and I conjure him to take it from me, or reftore me my Miftrefs; but what do I fay? fhe is not in his Power, then let him give me his Shine to purfue here but what do I lay? the is not in his Power, then let him give me his Ships to purfue her. Mula obey'd his Commands, and went to Ifmael, whilft fome Perfons, who remain'd with the Prince, were giving him an Account, with how much Precipitation the Queen went off, and that fhe had fet Sail for the Kingdom of Granada. Abelhamar (whofe Impatience was great,) wou'd not wait Mula's Return, but ran to Ifmael, who readily granted him all he defired :

fired; fo having chofen fome of the King's belt Ships, and fwifteft Sailers, he purfu'd Celima, whofe Fleet he knew was neither confiderable in Strength, or Number; tho' he did not reflect that his Squadron was still Inferior. Having put to Sea, he stood on the Quarter-Deck, endeavouring to discover fome of the Queen's Ships, when he spy'd a Vessel, not very distant. He gave Orders they shou'd make all Sail, which being executed, and the Wind fair, it was not long before he came up with her.

The first Object that prefented it felf to him, was the Count of La Vagne; for his and Olympia's Sailing had been prevented by ftormy Weather, which forc'd 'em back; fo they chofe to ftay on Shipboard, and remain in the Har-bour, where they waited a fair Opportunity of going on their Voyage. As foon as Abelhamar perceiv'd it was the Count, (whether he look'd on him as a Rival, who was the Occafion that his Passion for Felicia had not met with an obliging Return, or that he confider d him as an Enemy to that lovely Captive, hav-ing behav'd himfelf towards her in an ungrate-ful and perfidious manner,) he cou'd not help conceiving fo immoderate an Averfion for him, that he instantly commanded Mula to take the Barge, and go to the Count of La Vagne. Tell him, faid the Prince, that I look on him as a Traytor, who deferves Death; and if he has a Mind to fave Thofe who are with him, and have nothing to interpole in our Quarrel, he may come to me, or give me his Word of Honour,

Honour, and I will go and decide the Affair with him.

Mula went on Board the Count of La Vagne's Ship, and tho' he was not acquainted with Abelhamar, whom he was fure had no reafonable Motive to quarrel with him, yet he was fo offended, to fee himfelf fulpected being a Traytor, that without entering into a Detail, which might have made up the Difference, he leap'd into Mula's Boat. I will go, (faid he to him, with an Air full of Pride and Anger;) your Mafter fhall fee, that fuch a Man as I is not to be infulted unreveng'd. Thus without reflecting on the Danger to which he exposid himfelf, and even forgetting his dear Miffrefs, he order'd them to Row him to Abelhamar's Ship.

The Boat had already made fome Way, when Olympia's Woman awak'd her, and gave her an Account of what was paffing. Her Surprize was fo great, that fhe juft gave her felf Time to take her Night-Gown, then ran upon Deck, from whence, fhe perceiv'd her Lover at a great Diftance. Do you abandon me then, my dear Count, cry'd fhe, and are you going to expofe a Life, which is mine? What have you to fay to cruel Abelhamar? Oh! don't leave me fo; but come back to your dear Olympia, or take me along with you, that I may undergo the fame Fate. Whilft fhe was uttering thefe Words, the Count had reach'd Abelhamar's Ship. Olympia feeing this, defir'd the Captain of that fhe was in, to let her take his Barge, which being granted, ed, fhe bad them pull up with all Speed-towards the Prince's Ship; but fhe unfortunately arriv'd there too late: The Count was already engag d with Abelhamar; and tho' he fought with all the Courage and Dexterity imaginable, he was forc'd at length to yield, having received a mortal Wound.

ed a mortal Wound. As he was making his laft Efforts to defend himfelf, against Abelhamar's reiterated Blows, the unhappy Olympia came up, and perceiving at a finall Diftance, that her Lover was cover d with Blood, and hardly able to support himfelf, she cry'd out in a loud Voice, hold, barbarous Prince! hold! What have I done to you, that shou'd provoke you to deprive me of my Life? Don't you know that the Count of La Vagne is to be mine? Give fome Intermission to your Rage, (cruel as you are,) or if nothing but a Sacrifice will fatisfy you, I am here ready to receive the Blow; Come and pierce my Heart; but spare! oh! spare the Man Flove!

The Accent of a Voice to dear to the Count, reach'd him, juft as he fell at Abelhamar's Feet. He ftrove to raife his Head, and turning his Eyes towards Olympia's Barge, he faw his Divine Miftrefs defpairing, who with much ado got on Board the Ship, and was no fooner there, but fell in a Swoon near the Count, and remain'd Speechlefs a long while. After fhe was a little recover'd, all fhe cou'd do, was to lay her dying Lover's Head on her Knees, and bath his Wounds with her Tears: Thus opprefs'd with mortal Grief, fhe fate down without being able to complain. 202

The Count endeavour'd to speak to her, and taking her by the Hand, said, I die, my dear Olympia, I die entirely yours, and regret de-parting from Life, only for your sake. With thefe Words, his Soul took its Flight, and left his Body in the Arms of his deplorable Miltrefs, who faid fuch moving things, and acted fo much Despair, that even Abelbamar was inconfolable, for being the Author of her Afflicti-on. He fent her half dead on Board the Ship, the was in before, and order'd the Count of La Vagne's Corps to be alfo transported. Olympia, instead of going to Genoa, fail'd for Sardinia, in order to retire to her Aunt's Monastry, where (having erected a magnificent Tomb for her Lover) fhe continu'd the reft of her Days, lamenting the irreparable Lofs fhe had made. Thus we are often deceiv'd, when in the greateft hopes of an approaching Happinefs, which Fortune changes into the crucleft Torments.

Abelhamar wou'd not have left Olympia in this defolate Condition, had not his Paffion invited him elfewhere. He impatiently defir'd to overtake the Queen, being refolv'd to force his Felicia from her; and he was not long in his Purfuit, before they came to tell him, that they had difcover'd Celima's Ships. One may judge how extremely overjoy'd he was at this News. He immediately gave Orders to make all Sail, then imploying his Wifhes for Succefs and a fair Wind, prepar'd himfelf for an Engagement with the Queen's Squadron, who were alfo doing the fame.

This

This unfortunate Princefs knowing the Danger which threaten'd her, encourag'd her Pcople, and having fent to all the Captains to come on Board her Ship, she call'd a Council, then Orders were given, and each Officer thought of nothing but doing his Duty. The Trumpets began to found, and the Cannons roar'd, whilft on each fide they were endeavouring to gain the Advantage of the Wind, with a Refolution not to shew any Favour. Thus ready for a Fight, Celima faid to her Sofdiers, Observe that dangerous Serpent (pointing at Abelhamar, who was in Armour walking on his Quarter-Deck) fee that ungrateful Man, whom I brought up with fo much Care, he's now meditating my Ruin; did I not fpare his Life, tho' it ever endanger'd mine? yet he is not fatisfy'd with my quitting my Kingdom, to expose myself on this dangerous Element. He even purfues me, and fo greedily thirfts after Blood, that nothing can pleafe him but my Death: Helpime, ye brave and Loyal Subjects, to punish this Rebel, and let us by de-stroying him, afford an Example for other Traytors in Ages to come!

The Queen was thus animating her Soldiers, whilft Felicia and Inea were indulging their Melancholy. See my Dear! faid Felicia; fee, thefe dreadful Preparations; what can be the fatal Confequence of this Engagement? I fear, we fhall once more be the Victims of Fortune: Oh, Heaven! cry'd fhe, rather let me die, than fall into the Hands of Abelhamar, fince no greater Difafter can ever happen to me. Inea 304

Inea endeavour'd to comfort and give her hopes, faying, why do you thus afflict your felf, fince nothing, is yet decided ?... We are all preparing for a vigorous Refiftance, and the Weather begins to be fo Stormy, that one wou'd almost believe, it impossible for the two Fleets to approach. She was ftill fpeaking, when on a fudden, there arose such a boisterous Wind, with Thunder and Lightning, that on each fide, instead of continuing their Preparation, for a Fight, they were forc'd to employ all Hands to fave themfelves from greater Dangers. Thus the Elects were difpers'd without knowing which way to fteer their Courfe. The raging Wind rent the Sails and fplit the Masts, and the artless Pilot, with Death in his Looks, was torn from his Helm : The impetuous Waves tofs'd the Ships here, and there, till at laft, unable to withftand their refiftlefs Fury, some were dash'd against the Rocks, others wreck'd on the Shoar, and few efcap'd this terrible Tempest.

Abelhamar (having loft Sight of the Ship wherein he thought Felicia, and despairing of ever seeing her more) look'd on the Danger he was in, with fome kind of Satisfaction. No, (faid he to Mala, who made unfuccesful Efforts to confole his Master) no, shou'd I escape Death, which now threatens me, you must not think, that I can ever enjoy any Pleafure, or Happinefs, without the Poffession of Felicia: My Paffion for her increafes more and more, by and the mounted which the to her to make by the many Difficulties I meet with, and tho' I fee the fatal Powers, which oppofe me, yet nothing fhall make me change the Defign I have of purfuing her.

By this time the Weather grew more Calm, and Day being far advanc'd, the Prince was confulting Mula, which way he shou'd steer his Course to find his Mistress. He had already pass'd the Streights of Gibraltar, in order to go to Carthagena, or Porto Real, not doubting, but the Queen had reach'd one of those Harbours, to ihelter herself from the Storm; he therefore refolv'd for the Coaft of Andalufia, but they who accompany'd him, difapprov'd his Defign. Confider, my Lord, faid they, that this is the only Ship left of feveral, which Ifmael lent you, and that your purfuing Celima, may prove of a fatal Confequence: Her Sex, her Beauty and Misfortunes will plead for her, and what will the King of Granada think, to fee you come into his Dominions in Purfuit of an unhappy Princefs, who has abandon'd her's, and left you Master of them. He may detain you as an Hostage, till he has made advantageous Conditions in her favour, with the King of Tituan; and it is not to be expected, that this Monarch will continue your Friend, whilft you act contrary to his Intereft; for shou'd his generous Difpolition happen to change, he might take Poffession himself, of what he has just acquir'd for you. Let us return to Sallee, my Lord, continu'd they; if the Kingdom of X Fez

Fez remains in your Hands, you may foon be in a Condition to ask what you pleafe of the King of Granada, who will deliver up Felicia to you, rather than have any difference with you about a Christian Slave.

Abelhamar was mortally difpleas'd to fee, that the prefent Conjuncture oblig'd him to return to Fez; and what added to his Affliction in his way thither, was to meet on every fide the difmal Fragments of Ship-wracks, which cover'd the Surface of the Sea, and made him but too fenfible, that he had loft the greateft part of his Fleet.

The Queen, on her fide, had not been expos'd to leffer Dangers, for all her Fleet was difpers'd; and as the Wind drove her into the Port of Carthagena, the ftern of her Ship ftruck fo fiercely against another, that they both had like to have funk, which Accident shatter'd what the Storm had spar'd; but several Boats and Barges came immediately to the Queen's Affistance, and landed her safe with her Women and Equipage.

She had hardly ftep'd out of her Barge, but was inform'd of the great Alterations which had happen'd in the Kingdom of Granada, by the Death of Mahomet, who (being poifon'd by the means of a Gown, which was fent to him as a Prefent) had left the Crown to his Brother Joseph, whom he had detain'd Prifoner many Years in the Caftle of Salobrena. Celima fent an Officer of her Guards to congratulate this Prince, on his happy and unexpected Acceflion

Acceffion to the Throne, defiring him at the fame time, to take Compassion on her : She fent alfo to fome of her near Relations, who held the highest Rank in that Court.

The Governour of Carthagena, hearing that the Queen of Fez was landed, went to meet her with all the Marks of Honour and Reipect, that were due to her Quality. She had an Apartment prepar'd for her in the Caffle, where fhe remain'd two Days to repefe her felf, after the Danger and Fatigue, fhe had undergone; and from thence fet out for Gramada, where they were already inform'd of her Landing, and were prepar'd to receive her, being willing to give a Sanctuary to that unfortunate Queen.

Fofeph King of Granada immediately order'd his two. Sons, Mahomet and Ofmin, to go and meet Celima, with Affurances of his Concern for her Misfortunes, and how defirous he was to ferve her in all that lay in his Power. Thefe Princes were perfectly accomplish'd; and as the Prince of Carency had been confin'd by the late King's Orders, in the Cafile of Salobrena, whilft they were Prifoners there, they had conceiv'd fo entire a Friendship for him, that they refolv'd to fet him at Liberty, if ever their Condition fhou'd change; but the King their Father, being defirous to make Peace with the Spaniards, and knowing that the Infanta, Don Fernand, had offer'd Mahomet a considerable Ransom for the Count of La Vagne, (for he continu'd calling himfelf by that Title) X 2 thought, thought, that in detaining him, it might be a more effectual means to obtain what he fo earneftly with'd. Neverthelefs, as he had a particular Efteem for the Prince, he ask'd him if he wou'd give him his Honour, not to go away without his Confent; which the other having readily promis'd, the King took him along with him to Granada.

The Day he made his Entry, he fent the Prince of Carency a magnificent Drefs, with a rich Turbant and a Scymiter embellish'd with Jewels, which shew'd it was the King's pleafure he shou'd drefs himfelf after the Mooriss manner, in order to accompany him to all the Solemnities of his Coronation.

But the King, who had found in the Prince a great Refemblance of the brave Affimir (who was a Grandee of the Houfe of Abanferages, much confider'd in that Kingdom, and had been lately kill'd) us'd often to give the Prince that Name, out of a Mark of Fayour, who equally receiv'd it as fuch; and as he was unwilling to be known, he chofe rather to be called by that Name, than any other.

Tho' time had not been able to diminifh the Prince's Paffion, or alleviate his Grief, yet in fpite of his exceffive Melancholy, every Body diflinguifh'd him, as one of the fineft Gentlemen, that was ever known. Amongft all thofe who fhew'd him the greateft marks of Efteem, the Princes Mahomet and Ofmin particularly express'd themfelves his Friends. Mahomet had eminent Qualities, but was fo prefumptuous, fumptuous, that he wou'd have facrific'd any thing to gratify his Defires. His younger Brother, Ofmin, was as fine a Prince, and had nobler Inclinations, which made the King have a greater Affection for him, than for the reft of his Children.

As foon as News was brought of Celima's being near Granada, thefe two Princes (by the King their Father's Order, at the Head of the Noblemen of that Court) went out of Town to meet the Queen. The Prince of Carency was one of those, who accompany'd them in this Cavalcade, and each Cavalier had a Motto painted on his Shield : The Prince caus'd an Apollo pursuing Daphne, to be drawn on his, with these Words round it, written in Spanish, Quiero y busco quien me aborece y me fuyo; that is, I love and purfue one, who hates and flies me. This Thought express'd in a gallant Manner his difappointed Paffion. The Princes underftood it immediately, for whilft they were in Confinement together, he told 'em part of his Adventures, and made a Secret only of his and his Mistrefs's true Name, which he conceal'd for feveral political Reafons, efpecially on his Brother, and Don John of Velasco's Account, who had both fought against the Moors, and defeated them in feveral Engagements.

So many Hiftorians have inform'd the World, how highly the Moors, in those Days, diffinguilh'd themfelves above other Nations, by their Gallantry and Magnificence, that I shall decline extending that Subject, and only fay, that 3 that the unfortunate, but beauteous, Queen of Fez elected that Court for her Refuge, where the appear'd with fuch Attractives, as infpir'd Love in all, who beheld her.

Mahomet and his, Brother (accompany'd by the Prince of Carency in his. Moorifh Drefs, which admirably became him) met the Queen at a finall diftance from Granada. She fate alone in a fine open Chariot, and all her Women follow'd her in Chaises. Felicia and Inea were together in one, and had drawn the Curtains, to have an Opportunity of entertaining each other more conveniently. Ought we to look on our being near Spain, faid Felicia to her Friend, as a favourable Change towards our better Fortune? I think, reply d Inea, that the Circumstances can no ways prove to our Difadvantage. Alas! as for my part, interrupted Felicia, Ihave folittle hopes of Happiness in this Life, that I cou'd now leave the World with Pleafure. Inea did not omit any thing, which cou'd divert her from these melancholy Reflections, tho' fhe herfelf had caufe enough to be uneafy, not having heard from her dear Don Ramire. Whilft they were talking, the Princes alighted, and faluted the Queen with many Affurances in the Name of the King their Father; then took Horfe again, and rode by the fide of her Chariot, entertaining her Majesty, with what was most fuitable to the Occasion of her Voyage, But Celima became of a fudden so pensive, that she cou'd hardly make 'em any Anfwer; her Eyes were entirely fix'd on the Prince of Carency, and the had not Power to turn them on any other Object: Her Joy and Surprize were equally extraordinary, and what added to both, was feeing him in a Moorifb Drefs, which gave her a Curiofity to ask his Name of one of the Guards, that was near her, who (not knowing, that the Prince was a Prifoner of War, but had only feen him with the King, in his Journey from Salobrena to Granada,) told the Queen he was call'd Affimir.

She immediately conjectur'd, he had fome important Reafons, which oblig'd him to af-fume that Name, and Difguife, fo did not ask any other Questions relating to him; yet what gave her fome Uneafinefs, was to find that he did not take any particular Notice of her. She was a good while in Expectation he wou'd have spoken to her; at last seeing he continu'd Silent, fhe addrefs'd her Discourfe to him, and for a pretence ask'd him the Signification of the Motto, which the had perceiv'd on his Shield. He told her the Meaning, and added, that he was the unhappieft Man in the World. The Queen imagin'd, that by the Apollo, he meant himfelf; and Dapkne to be her, which fill'd her Mind with fuch Ideas, as were too pleafing to be exprefs'd. I have fometimes had a Prophetick Spirit (faid fhe to him finiling) and have foretold things without knowing their true Caufe : Methinks I have a great Disposition to do you the fame Favour, Affimir! Your Daphne neither flies, nor nor hates you, and you shall foon have the Satisfaction of feeing her. Ah, Madam! cry'd the Prince transported, what do you tell me? Is it possible, that the cruel fair One, who is the Object of my Sufferings, will at laft vouchfafe to make me happy? Yes, (reply'd Celima, with a gracious Air) fhe is as willing as you, to put a period to your Torments, and I promise you, that as foon as I am a little at Leifure, I will tell you more of the matter. Alas, Madam! reply'd he, I do not deferve, that fo great a Queen shou'd be concern'd in my Fortune, which hitherto has prov'd very fatal, and I dare hardly hope a better one for the future. Celima faid no more to him at that time, fearing the particular Diftinction, she had shewn him, might be taken Notice of, which undoubtedly wou'd have difoblig'd Mahomet, who had already found fo many Charms in the Queen, that he cou'd not fufficiently deplore her Misfortunes; and whilft he was thus offering her his Pity, a more powerful Passion made way to his Heart.

The nearer Celima approach'd Granada, the more the admired the Beauty of that famous City, which is fituated in a Plain, at the Extremity whereof is a fnowy Hill, from whence fpring two Rivers, the Daro, and Genil; the one often produces Gold-Duft, mix'd with the Sand, and the other pure Silver. The Air of that Climate is fweet, and refin'd, and there feldom appears any Winter; the Spring and Autumn united, afford Flowers and Fruit, without without being at the trouble of cultivating the Earth. There are whole Forefts of Orange, Mirtle, and Pomgranate Trees; and as Nature had taken Care to embellifh the Country, fo no Art had been fpar'd to beautify the City, which was incompats'd with a ftrong Wall, and Twelve Hundred Towers. The Palace of Alhambro (which the Kings had chofen for their Court) was fo magnificent, that nothing but the Caftle of Abbaycin cou'd be equal to it, which on every fide fhin'd with Gold and Azure, fupported by Marble and Porphyry; befides, the Moors obferv'd an admirable Order in Architecture, which highly recommended their Buildings; and as for their Gardens, Walke and Fountains, they were fo wonderfully well contriv'd, that nothing cou'd be added to their Beauty and Agreeablenefs.

The Queen arriv'd at the Gates of the Town, where the People affembled in great Multirudes: But the Prince of Carency, to avoid the Crowd, took another way, which infenfibly led him to the fide of the River Daro, whence he continued till he came to a Fountain, whofe Water was as clear as Crystal; the deep Silence, which reign'd in that Place, and the Inclination he had to meditate on what the Queen of Fez had faid to him, invited him to alight; he ty'd his Horfe to a Tree, and lay down on the Grafs; then calling to mind what Celima had told him, by what Chance, thought he, did this Princefs (who never faw me before) fingle me out to acquaint me, that Leonida fill fiil loves me, and that I shall foon fee her. Has any one inform'd her of my Sentiments -Methinks it does not well become one of her Rank, to rally an unfortunate Man, who cannot even flatter himfelf with Hopes, much lefs with the real Enjoyment of fo unexpected a Bleffing:

"He was drown'd in Reflections of this Nature, when the Voice of a Man; (who fpoke the Arabick Tongue) interrupted him, asking whether the Queen of Fez was yet arriv'd at Gra-nada? The Prince knew very well, that the Perfon who was coming up to him was a Stranger, and that he only fpoke Arabick to him, becaufe of his Drefs, fuppoling him to be fome Grandee in Alliance with the Moors. He fix'd his Eyes on this Foreigner, but Heavens! how great was their furprize, when they knew each other. Benavidez (for it was he) cou'd not help turning pale at the thoughts of his Perfidioufnefs, and the Prince, fwelling with Anger, faid to him, From whence come you, unworthy Wretch that you are? What Dæmon has convey'd you here to receive the Punishment of of your Treacheries ? Finishing these Words, he drew his Sword, and us'd it with fuch Fiercenefs, that the Spaniard, notwithstanding his Bravery, was daunted and feiz'd with Terrour; till at last, calling Despair to his Succour, and feeing the inevitable Danger he was in, he fought rather like a defperate Man, than one who had a mind to fave his Life. The Prince, refolving not to fpare him, reiterated his Blows 111 with

with fuch Vigour, that he foon gave Benavidez a mortal Wound, which made him fail at his Feet. Ah! my Lord (faid he to the Prince, with a feeble and incoherent Accent) it is but just, I shou'd die by your Hand, after all the Injuries I have done you. Did I deserve such Ulage, Traitor, reply'd the Prince? Since you can deceive me no longer, where have you left perfidious Leonida ? Now is the time to convince me, that you are yet capable of repenting a bafe Action. I am willing to obey you, (anfwer'd Benavidez, ftretching out his Hand) upon Condition, that you will forgive me. Speak, and I will even forget all, faid the Prince; tell me what is become of my Leonida. I declare to you (reply'd Benavidez, whole Face fhew'd the Symptoms of an approaching Death) that Leonida never ceas'd loving you; fhe no ways confented to her Flight, but al-most confum'd with Grief, loaded me with the cruelleft Reproaches, and her utmost Aversion was the only return the made my Paffion ; yet in spite of her Tears and Resistance, I took her with me on Board a Ship, and was promifing myfelf a happy Voyage, when we were met by fome of the Enemy's Ships, who engag'd, and took ours: I was fo dangeroufly wounded, that — Farewel, my Lord ; I can fay no more, I am dying. His Eyes inftantly clos'd, and his Soul made its Exit, whilft he was lying in the Prince's Arms. Benavidez's Death touch'd the Prince of Ca-

Benavidez's Death touch'd the Prince of Carency's generous Soul, who forgetting all his Ingratitude, Ingratitude, began to pity him, faying, that he wou'd never have been guilty of the Crimes he had committed, cou'd he have defended his Heart from Leonida's Charms; and looking on him as an unhappy Rival, and a reconciled Enemy, his Compatition took Place of his Refentment: He reflected on what Benavidez had just told him, relating to his dear Leonida, but he was perfectly inconfolable, not knowing the Enemies, who had taken her. Fatal Death! cry'd he, thou haft fnatch'd away the Life of a Man, who was going to in-form me of a Circumstance, which is of the greatest Importance to me. Where must I fly to feek the Object of my Love, and how can I tell into whofe Hands fhe is fallen? Oh Heavens! am I not more unfortunate than ever? The Thoughts of her being inconftant; gave fome Intermission to my Passion, for which I was endeavouring to find a Cure; but now the Cafe is chang'd ; I am concern'd for a Mistress, to whom I am contracted; she has ever been true to me, and perhaps, has found a Lover and a Master, in the Man who has her now in his Possession. Oh unparallel'd Fatality ! How tormenting will thefe Apprehenfions be to my afflicted Soul ? Which way shall I go to find her? The Prince was fo deeply involv'd in these anxious Reflections, that he did not immediately perceive a Wound he had receiv'd in his Arm; but finding himfelf grow weak by the great Lofs of Blood, he thought fit to retire.

Juft

Just as he enter'd the Town, he met Zulema, who was a Moor of the Family of Abenferages, to whofe Guard he had been committed by Orders of the late King, whils he was Prifoner in the Castle of Salobrena. The Prince having a Confidence in this Moor, thought he cou'd not chuse any one more capable of ordering Benavidez's Burial; therefore he defired Zulema to oblige him in this Occasion, who without delay, tho' the Night was far spent, took fome Slaves with him, and went to the Fountain, in order to execute the Prince's Commands.

As he came near the Place, he heard a Perfon lamenting grievoully, which at first furpriz'd him, not diftinguishing what he faid ; but having alighted from his Horfe, he perceiv'd a Man, who was embracing Benavidez's Body, and bemoaning his Misfortune in the Spanish Tongue. Ah! my dear Benavidez, faid he, how unlucky it is, that I was not here to defend you against the Traitors, who have murder'd you. Alas! my Uncafinefs and Fears had already foretold your Death. Here Zulema interrupted this Stranger, and being compassionate, told him, Benavidez had not been kill'd by any treacherous means; and that he, who fought him, was fo generous an Enemy, that he had even defir'd him to come and fee the Corps interr'd. The Spaniard, who was very young, express'd his Concern by his Tears; and faid, Oh Sir ! Nothing can alleviate my Affliction, fince I have loft all, in losing my dear Master. Zulema endeavour'd to to comfort him, then order'd his People to take the Corps, and bury it in a little Wood, not far from the Fountain.

This being perform'd, Zulema (who was naturally generous, and then mov'd with Pity at the repeated Complaints of this Servant of Benavidez) ask'd him, if he wou'd go along with him to Granada. You shall be fafe in my House, faid he, which is a Favour your Countrymen cannot well expect in this Kingdom. Don Sanche (for that was the Spaniard s Name,) hefitated fome time before he made an Anfwer, but at last, whether Fear or Prudence prevail'd with him, he told Zulema, that fince he was pleas'd to offer him his House for a Sanctuary, he was very willing to wait on him. Zulema, who was uneafy about the Prince's Wound, went directly to fee him, and the mean while fent the Spaniard to his Houfe, to wait his return.

The Prince was in Bed, and the Surgeon, who had drefs'd his Wound, found it fomewhat dangerous, which foon occafion'd a Report in the Town, that he hadhad a Rencounter; tho' the Particulars were not known; and when Zulema enter'd the Prince's Chamber, he found the King's two Sons fitting by him, who were much concern'd at this Accident. Mahomet thus continued the Difcourfe he had already begun; I muft tell you, it is unkind, to make a Myftery to us of your Enemy's Name. I owe you, my Lord, reply'd the Prince, too much Gratitude and Affection, ever to do that which which might deferve a Reproach from you; I fhou'd be very willing to tell you who was my Enemy, if there were Caufe to apprehend any farther Confequences, but I am entirely eafy on that Score; befides, I am oblig'd to keep a Secret, which I was fworn to, before I thought you wou'd have ask'd me the Detail of this Affair, fo beg leave to be filent.

Ofmin fearing this Conversation might create fome Uneafinefs in the Prince, obligingly wav'd the Difcourfe, and faid to him; You have loft very much by not attending the Queen of Fez, for (laying afide the honoura-ble Reception the King my Father gave her, and the extraordinary Luftre which the Ladies of our Court appear'd in) fhe commanded all her, Slaves to pull off their Veils, and I must confess, we were both astonish'd, and charm'd, to fee fo many beautiful Creatures. Their Praise was the chief Entertainment of the Court, and I am perfuaded, they will caufe many a Lover to be guilty of Infidelity. That is already your Cafe, Brother, reply'd Mahomet finiling, and you cannot deny, but the Eyes of that Felicia (whofe Name you were fo defirous to know) have made fuch an Impreffion, as may endanger your Liberty. I own to you, faid Ofmin, that I prefer her to all the reft; her Beauty is not to be pa-rallel'd; and I am furpriz'd, Brother, that you escap'd falling her Captive. No, answer'd Mahomet, my Heart is not so casily wounded. STILLY

ed. Alas, my Lord! interrupted the Prince of Carency, perhaps your Time is not come, but you will find your felf as fenfible as any of us, when you meet with the Object, whom Deftiny has decreed to infpire you. As for my part, I dread that fatal Moment, as much as a Pilot does a Rock in a Storm. Why don't you beftow your Inclinations on a Slave like Felicia, reply'd Ofmin ? At least, you wou'd be free from any cruel Torments. Who can tell, my Lord, faid the Prince, whether that Slave will like the Man, who has a Passion for her? Love is capricious, and ever guid-ed by Fancy, therefore a Slave may look with Indifference on the greatest Monarch in the World. How can you thus oppose my Satisfaction with your Reflections, cry'd Ofmin ? Wou'd you have me ceafe loving Felicia out of groundless Apprehensions ? Indeed, Brother, reply'd Mahomet, it's strange you shou'd fay, you love a Person, whom you hardly know. Nay, you may stile it as you please (faid Ofmin,) but what I can affirm is, that the Perfections of this young Captive have already engag'd me : Nothing in Nature can be more beautiful! no, nor even comparable to this lovely Creature; and I impatiently with Assimir's Recovery, that he may be able to make his court to the Queen of Fez; he will then be judge of what I advance.

It will not be fo eafy to fee her, as you imagine, my Lord, interrupted Zulema, (who had been filent all this while) I have been at Salee, where where I ftay'd a confiderable Time, and the Negotiations I was imploy'd in, by the late King, gave me frequent Opportunities of having both private and publick Audiences with the Queen; yet, whenever I was admitted, I found her furrounded with the oldest, and ugliest Women in the World. She us'd to fet a frict Watch on all her pretty Slaves, and keep 'em 'fo conceal'd, that unlefs her Humour be much alter'd, 'I am fure you will find fome Difficulty in paying your Courtship to Felicia. That Sex is very unjust, cry'd Ofmin; I fuppofe Celima will not let her Slaves be feen, for fear they shou'd eclipse her Charms. 'Tis you that are unjust, reply'd Mahomet, why shou'd you attribute to any other Cause, a Custom which has been long eftablish'd, only for the fafety of Slaves? Every one must agree, that Celima is endow'd with too many Excellencies, to apprehend any thing from other Beauties. Ha, Brother ! faid Ofmin; you were boafting a while ago of your Infenfibility, but I find by the paffionate Air, with which you express yourfelf in the Queen's Defence, that you are not so very indifferent, as you wou'd make us believe. Mahomet, who had no mind to fatisfy his Brother on that Subject, made no Reply, but rifing up, address'd himself to Affimir, (meaning the Prince of Carency) whom he embrac'd; and after having defir'd him to take Care of his Health, he and his Brother took their leave of him. Zulema retir'd at the fame time, without acquainting him, that he Y

he had met Benavidez's Servant. The Prince on the other Hand was impatient to entertain him, but there was no possibility of doing it, till the next Day.

One may imagine, the Prince pass'd but a very ill Night. What the Queen and Benavidez had faid to him, strangely perplex'd his Mind, which, being added to the Pain he fuffer'd by his Wound, threw him before Morning into a violent Feaver. Zulema, who had a particular Concern for the Prince, rofe early, and went to enquire after his Health; they told him he had not repos'd all Night, and if he pleas'd, might go into his Chamber. As foon as the Prince perceiv'd him; Ah my dear Zu; lema! faid he, I was withing to fee you: All that pass'd Yesterday, has put me into such a diforder, as I shall not be able to overcome. without your Affiftance. The Queen of Fez fpoke to me, as if the knew me, and I remark'd in her Air and Eyes, fomething more obliging, than is ufually express'd for a Person one has never seen; besides, she assures me, that my Mistress neither flies, nor hates me, and that I shall have the pleasure of seeing her foon. Who cou'd have inform'd her of a thing fo positive? I shou'd be inclin'd to think, that Chance was the only Caufe why fhe entertain'd me fo agreeably, were it not for the Rencounter I had Yesterday near the Fountain. He whom I fought was my Rival, the fame Benavidez, who carry'd off my Felicia : He told me with his laft Breath, fhe had ever lov'd me, 2.1 and

and that her Sentiments for me were flill the fame; it is not probable, he wou'd have utter'd an untruth, in fo difmal a Condition. But juft as he was going to tell me where he had left her, he was depriv'd both of his Speech and Life. You cannot imagine, how this grieves my Soul; Felicia loves me, can any Happinefs be greater? Yet Alas! I have loft her, and know not where to enquire after her: What Misfortune can be equal to mine? Here he was fome time filent.

Zulema told him, that a more favourable Fortune wou'd certainly disclose a Secret, on which depended his Felicity; and that he did not doubt, but he might receive fome Infor-mation from a young Man, he found weeping near Benavidez's Body, whom he had detain'd at his House for that purpose. Oh! I conjure you, fend for him immediately, cry'd the Prince ; I remember, his Master in approaching me, ask'd whether the Queen of Fez was yet arriv'd at Granada ; perhaps fhe knew him, and that in relating his Adventures to her, he mention'd fomething concerning mine. I ought not to neglect any means in my prefent Circumftances ; for if that young Man was with Benavidez, when he ran away with my Mif-trefs, and can tell me what is become of her, I shall be blefs'd above Mankind.

I perceive fo great an Emotion in you, my Lord, reply'd Zulema, that I am forry for having acquainted you with a Particular, which may be prejudicial to your Health. No, faid Y 2 the the Prince, do not fear any thing; but if you have either Love, or Pity, relieve me in this urgent Occasion. Shall I tell you then what I was thinking, answer'd Zulema? Ofmin spoke to you Yesterday very much in Praise of one Felicia, who is a Slave of Celima's ; it is probable she may be the Person you love. I began to fuspect the fame, interrupted the Prince, but was not willing to harbour fuch a Thought; for there are many Felicias in Spain, and after the Adventure I had at Jaen with Don Alonso by a Mistake, which that Name occasion'd, I have room to fear the like Difappointment; I only beg you will fend for the young Man, you fpoke of.

Zulema commanded one of his Slaves, in whom he confided, to give a Moorifh Drefs to the Spaniard, and bring him immediately along with him: This was the Precaution he us'd to prevent his being taken at Granada for a Sranger. Don Sanche was a little unwilling at first, to go out of Zulema's House, not knowing where they intended to carry him; but the Slave having told him, they were going to an intimate Friend of his Master's, whose Name was Affimir, he readily follow'd him, believing Allimir was a Moor ; and he continued in the fame Opinion, even when he enter'd the Prince of Carency's Chamber, who was in Bed, and the Windows clos'd. Come nearer Don Sanche, faid Zulema to him, and tell us fincerely, what you know concerning Felicia of Leon. This 1 14

This unexpected Queftion furpriz'd the Spaniard, who was fome time without making any Anfwer. What! faid the Prince, do you hefitate? Tell me immediately what is become of her. Were you not with your Mafter, when he carry'd her away ? Heavens! What new Aftonifhment did this Voice create! Don Sanche, or (to explain myself in a clearer manner) Casilda, Sifter to Benavidez, (for it was she, who was thus difguis'd) was fuddenly ftruck with fuch a violent Trembling, that had not the Chamber been very dark, it wou'd have been impossible to conceal her Diforder: Her Eyes were endeavouring to fee the Perfon whom her Heart already knew, whilft the Prince on his fide, was in the utmost Impatience to be inform'd of his Mistress's Fate. What (faid she to her felf) shall my Rival for ever be ador'd, and cou'd her Abfence no ways extinguish the Prince's Paffion? Was ever Misfortune equal to mine? Then refolving at once, not to mention any thing, which might difcover Leonida's being with the Queen of Fez; 'tis true, my Lord, faid she, I was with Don Fernand Benavidez, when he ran away with the fair Lady you nam'd, and we shou'd have had a prosperous Voyage, were it not for the fatal Rencounter of two Turkish Ships, who engag'd ours, and took it, my Master being the only Man, that refifted with undaunted Courage. The Captains of these Ships were fo charm'd with Felicia's Beauty, which had receiv'd no Injury from her Affliction, that they refolv'd to carry Y 3 her her to Constantinople, in order to present her to the Grand Seignior; therefore having given her a very Rich Drefs, they brought her to that Emperour, who was fo mightily taken with her, that he immediately plac'd her in his Seraglio. As for my Mafter and I, good Fortune wou'd have it that we were fold to the Balhaw of Morea, who knew Don Fernand Benavidez, to whom he was indebted for fome confiderable Service; he had render'd him in Spain. This Balhaw was a famous Renegado, which was his only Crime; for he was very generous, and fo grateful, that he reftor'd us to our Liberty without requiring any Ranfom. Thus we return'd to Andalusta, where we were just landed, when my Master heard that the Queen of Fez was coming to Granada, which determin'd him to come hither, in order to pay his Court to her.

The Prince, during Cafilda's Relation, was feiz'd with an unfpeakable Affliction, when he heard, that Felicia was among the Grand Seignior's Women: The Anxiety of fuch a cruel Thought over-power'd his Senfes, and his Wound opening, To great a quantity of Blood gufh'd out, that it flung him into a Swoon.

Zulema, furpriz'd at the Prince's Silence, fpoke to him, but as he made no Reply, he took his Hand, which was in a cold Sweat; this ftartled him, and calling for a Light, he faw the Picture of Defpair painted on the Face of this unfortunate Prince, who was without Motion, and his Palenefs wou'd have perfuad-

ed one, that his Soul had already left his Body. But how thall I reprefent here the deplorable Condition of Cafilda, whofe Pattion was rais'd to fuch a Tranfcendency, that having no Regard to her Honour, the fram'd a falle Story, to deftroy the Prince's Hopes of ever feeing his divine Miftrefs; at another time the wou'd have facrific'd a Thoufand Lives to have fav'd his, but at this Juncture had he died, one might have accus'd her with being the Caufe of his Death.

Had not Zulema's Concern been fo great. he wou'd have eafily difcover'd that of the Counterfeit Don Sanche, who without Reftraint, shed a Deluge of Tears, and express'd a more than ordinary Care in affifting the Prince, who at last receiving a little Strength. from the Cordials they gave him, open'd his weak Eyes, which he fix'd languithingly on his Friend and Don Sanche, whofe Face he thought he knew, yet did not take much Notice of him; then turning to Zulema, Ah, pity me! cry'd he, fince my Misfortunes can never be greater; they are come to their last period. I had lost my Felicia, and thought her falfe, which in fome Measure suppress'd my tormenting Passion; but now I am informed, fhe is Living, and that her Affection for me is still the fame. Had that Tyrant, Death. fnatch'd her from me, I fhou'd doubtlefs have been inconfolable for her Lofs, yet methinks I shou'd be free from those tumultuous Fears, which now rack my Mind, Oh! What dif-Y 4 mal 328

mal Objects appear to my distracted Imagina-9 tion! Felicia in the Seraglio, and belov'd by the Grand Seignior! Heavens! What greater Cruelty can ever be inflicted on a Man, fo paf-" fionately in Love ? I have loft her, and shall never fee her more ; I am even jealous, and I fear her Heart will at last yield to the barba-> rous Laws, which ill Fortune has impos'd on her. Here his diffurb'd Thoughts interrupted his Difcourfe, whilft Zulema was using all his Endeavours to mitigate fo violent a Grief.1 Felicia had too fincere a Passion for you, faid he, ever to change in favour of a Prince, who is no ways agreeable, and is too proud, to give himfelf the leaft Trouble towards obtaining the Favours of a Lady; he thinks all muft fubmit to his Authority, and I am perfuaded, that as fhe will neither relifh his Addresses, nor make any Return, her Refistance and Coldness will foon' render her indifferent to the Emperour. Suppose I were free from these Apprehensions, interrupted the Prince, by what means shall I. hear from her? Is fhe not in the Grand Seignior's Seraglio, and abfolutely loft for me? Oh, 'tis too true! I cannot flatter myfelf, no, not even wish to see her more, which Misfortune compleats my Despair.

Cafilda was in no fmall Confusion, when the heard him fpeak in fuch passionate Terms. She was feveral times tempted to make herfelf known, that the might addrefs herfelf to him, in the tenderest Expressions, Love cou'd infpire; but calling to mind what pass'd between 'em, when when the acquainted him with Leonida's Flight, it made her apprehend, that if the fpoke to him at this Juncture, 1 it would be as ill timed. therefore thought proper to wait another Opportunity; in the mean time, the affected an extraordinary Concern for the Prince, who remark'd it, and was not flow in fhewing his Acknowledgments; for he told her (thinking he was fpeaking to a Man) that altho' his prefent Fortune (being then a Prifoner) did not permit him to beftow great Favours on those who were in his Service, yet if he was willing to flay with him till he cou'd be better provided for, he wou'd take Care of him. Affimir little knew the Effect this Propofal created in our difguis'd Lady, who immediately accepted it, with all imaginable Marks of Joy and Refpect, affuring him, that no Body wou'd ferve him with more Zeal and Fidelity ; but before we fee how strict she was to her Promise, let us be inform'd by what Chance flie came to Granada.

Abelhamar and the Admiral of Fez having taken the Ship Leonida was in, it was thought Benavidez cou'd not recover of the Wounds, he had receiv'd in his vigorous Refiftance, fo was left for Dead; but after Leonida had been conducted on Board the Admiral, they found in Benavidez fome Symptoms of Life, which made 'em take care of him, till they were landed at Sallee, where he continued a long time extremely ill. Leonida knew nothing of it, being ftrictly guarded in the Palace; but as foon as he was recover'd, he refolv'd either 330 pay her Ranfom, or carry her off by Stratagem. With this Defign he wrote to Cafilda; who having received his Letter, loft no times in preparing for that Voyage; and as her Paffion for the Prince of Carency had met with no. Return but Difdain, she was meditating on some desperate Enterprize, in order to act a Vengeance proportionable to the Injury; the thought this might be a favourable Opportunity, therefore taking her Jewels, with a confiderable Sum of Money, the difguis'd herfelf in Man's Apparel to prevent her being known, and embark'd for Sallee, where the arriv'd foon after, with the Refolution of taking away Leonida's Life; and to fucceed in her wicked Defign, the had brought with her a Box of the fubtilest Poifon.

D Benavidez was not a little overjoy'd at Cahlda's Arrival, and after he had paid his Ranfom to the Admiral, he only thought of recovering Leonida: But the Queen, having an extraordinary Friendship for her, hardly fuffer'd her to be out of her Sight, which made him fear his attempt wou'd be in vain. This was the State of his Affairs, when the King of Tunis invaded the Kingdom, of Fez, which oblig'd Celima to abandon Sallee; and at the fame time that she embark'd, Benavidez and his Sifter in difguife took their paffage in one of the Ships, which were bound for Granada: During their Voyage, they often faw Leonida aboard the Queen's Ship, whole Sight only inflam'd Benavidez's Heart with Love, and Cahlda's filda's with Rage; but the dreadful Storm which arofe, difperfing the Fleet, their Ship was driven fome Leagues beyond Carthagena, where they landed, and fet out immediately on Horfeback for Granada. Cafilda, who was of a weak Conflitution, and already very much fatigu'd with her Voyage, was left a great way behind, which was the Occafion of her not arriving, till after her Brother's Rencounter with the Prince of Carency, which was then too late.

I have already told you with what Marks of Honour and Diffinction the Queen of Fez was receiv'd at her Arrival at the Court of Granada; but I did not mention the magnificent Entertainment the King gave her at the Palace of Alhambro; after which, the Princes and most part of the Noblemen conducted her to the Castle of the Abbaicyn, which was prepar'd for her, and there took leave of her Majesty.

As foon as fhe was at Liberty to give fome time to Reflection, fhe went to take the Air on a Terrace Walk, adjoyning her Apartment, which had a Profpect over the River Daro; there a thoufand hurrying Thoughts flarted from her Mind: What Courfe fhall I take, faid fhe to herfelf, and whom fhall I truft with my Secret? Muft I once more (to the Shame of my Sex and Glory) make my Weaknefs known to this lovely Stranger? Heaven has fent him to me again, and I am inclin'd to believe he is thinking on me. Yes certainly!

certainly ! The Apollo purfuing Daphne, which was painted on his Shield, with his Motto; nay more than that, his languishing Looks and Diffractions; in fliort, every thing per-fuades me, he is in Love; yet if it were with me, ought not he to be infpir'd with fome Motions of Sympathy, which wou'd have told him that his Unknown of Nicopolis and the Queen of Fez were the fame? Why does he not differer as many Charms in my Per-fon, as he did in my Wit and Generofity? Alas, he was then too young to feel the Effects of Love; Gratitude was the only thing that mov'd him to make a Return, and I now fear, fome fofter Care imploys his Thoughts: But, continu'd she, I cannot persuade myself that Fortune has brought him once more in my way, only to add fresh Afflictions to those I have already undergone: I am rather disposed to look on this, as the beginning of a Hap-pines, which will end by the Destruction of my Enemies. (This Prince is nearly related to the King of France; I will make myfelf a Chriftian, and in giving him my Hand, prefent him with my Crown: He may head an Army and invade the Kingdom of Fez, which he foon will be Mafter of. The People, by my Example, will fubmit to his Laws; and after being an unhappy Fugitive, defitute of all Hopes, I shall fee myself Crown'd with unfpeakable Felicity. Celima thus indulg'd her Imagination, till it grew fo late, that she thought fit to retire to her Apartment, where fhe fhe pass'd the Night betwixt fost Repose, and a Thousand agreeable Ideas, which made her appear the next Day in all her Charms. - But before the Queen wou'd admit of any Visit, she fent for Felicia, to whom she spoke in these Terms; I am defirous to know, whether your Sentiments for the Count of La Vagne are still the fame; therefore, Felicia; confess ingenuously the Truth. Has not his Perfidiousness been capable to extinguish the Affection you had for him, when you were perfuaded of his, Conftancy ? Search well into your Heart; for I have some Reason to enquire about it; and whatever Anfwer you make me, I shall not love you the lefs. These Questions caus'd some Surprize in Felicia, who at first, had a mind to difguise her Sentiments; but having confider'd, that fhe had not long before confess'd her Weakness to the Queen, fhe was of Opinion, it was better to fpeak her Thoughts without any Diffimulation. Madam, reply'd she, since they are your Majesty's Commands, I cannot refuse obeying ; I own with the utmost Confusion, that till now, it has not been in my Power to banish from my Heart the fatal Idea of the Count of La Vagne. I daily entertain myfelf with the Caufe I have to hate him as the cruelleft of my Enemies: Yet alas! it is paft my Skill, and I dare not even hope, that time it felf will ever be able to effect my Cure. You do love him then, interrupted the Queen? If Love confifts in often thinking of a Perfon, reply'd . Felicia, I am am convinc'd I still have an Affection for him. I may now confide in you, reply'd the Queen, therefore hear me, and be fecret.

I was hardly out of my Infancy, when my unlucky Stars decreed I shou'd fall into the Hands Bajazet, whose Passion for me only increas'd my Aversion to him, and I thought nothing cou'd be more deplorable than my Destiny.

These were my Sentiments when he went into Missia, and compell'd me to go along with him, where after a Victory over the Christians, he was defirous to fee the Prisoners of Distinction, who had been taken; and as out of a politick Motive he endeavour'd to infpire me with Cruelty, and inure me to Tragick Scenes, he order'd, I shou'd be placed at a Window which was grated; and look'd over the Court, where the Christians were to suffer Death, and feveral Noblemen of France had already been executed, when I faw a young Prince appear, whofe Beauty furpafs'd that which we attribute to the God of Love : He feem'd to be about Fifteen or Sixteen Years of Age; he was tall, well-fhap'd, and had fair Hair, which hung in fine Curls on his Shoulders, and in spite of his careless Air, he had fomething fo great and noble in his Mien, that the other Princes were not to be compar'd to him. Oh, Felicia! cou'd you but imagine what I felt in that Moment; a quick Emotion feiz'd all my Soul, I was troubled without knowing the Caufe, and in a Word, had 11.12 like like to have died, for fear Bajazet flou'd have taken away a Life, which was already dearer to me than my own. I began to think what I cou'd do, to deliver this lovely Prince from the immediate Danger which threaten'd him; whether to fling myfelf at Bajazet's Feet, and beg his Life, or to offer myfelf a Victim in his Room, for I cou'dhave done any thing to fave him; but whilft a Thoufand fuch Thoughts were torturing my Mind, the Emperor refolv'd on accepting his Ranfom, which News fo tranfported me, that my Joy was inexpreffible.

ble. This young Prince was Prifoner in the Tower of Nicopolis, and as my Apartment had a Prospect of it, I us'd to pass whole Days at my Clofet Window in fruitlefs Sighs and Wifhes; but one Evening, as I was endeavouring, with the help of a Telescope, to discover the Object I fo dearly lov'd, I perceiv'd him walking on the Leads of the Tower, and he appear'd to me fo melancholy, that it threw me into the deepest Concern. I immediately refolv'd on writing to him, notwithstanding the Danger to which I expos'd myself, if Bajazet had known it: But Love is often more lucky than wife, and Chance on that Occasion is a much better Servant than Reafon. When I had ended my Letter, I confided it to an Eunuch, who had attended me a long time, and shew'd a particular Affection for my Service. What did I not fay to perfuade him to be faithful? which having promis'd me, even even at the hazard of his Life, he convey'd my Letter to the Top of the Tower by means of an Arrow; and the Prince having receiv'd it, fent me an Anfwer, which entirely vanquifh'd me. I was inform'd that his Ranfom was not come, and the more I confider'd how dear he daily grew to me, the greater Caufe I had to fear equally for him and myfelf. I was perfectly acquainted with Bajazet's inhuman Temper, and too fenfible of my own Weaknefs, to believe that it wou'd be in my Power to fly a Prince, who fo entirely poffefs'd my Thoughts. Thefe Confiderations oblig'd me to take Meafures for his immediate Departure; but alas! What Torments did not I endure, thro' the Neceffity of fo cruel a Refolution?

To this Effect, I was forc'd once more to confide in my Eunuch, who brib'd one of the Prince's Guards, by whofe means a ftrong Box was convey'd into his Chamber, wherein I fent him a confiderable Sum to pay his Ranfom, and a Letter, which was the laft I wrote to him, being bereft of the hopes of ever feeing him more. Imagine, Felicia, how many anxious Hours I have pafs'd, fince that unlucky Day!

Soon after, Bajazet's Fortune met with an unhappy Change; for Tamerlane having engag'd him, gain'd a compleat Victory, and took him Prifoner. It was with no fmall difficulty I made my Efcape, and return'd to my Father's Dominions; where I was no fooner arriv'd, but feveral Kings and Princes made their Addreffes dreffes to me, fome out of Ambition, and others out of a fincere Love for my Perfon; but I was fo entirely prepoffefs'd with the Idea of him, who had charm'd me at Nicopolis, that nothing at Sallee was capable of making an Impreflion on me; fo in fpight of mytelf I was in Love, without Hopes of a return. This was the State of my Mind at my Arrival here ; but how can I express the Surprize and Agitation I was in, when amongst the Noblemen, who came to receive me out of the Gates of the Town, I perceiv'd the Man I love. This Christian Prince (under the Name, and Drefs of a Moor) appear'd to me as charming as ever; no, it's impossible for you to comprehend what I felt at fo unexpected a Rencounter. My Heart was feiz'd with fo many different Motions, that I was not able to fpeak; and whilft 1 was endeavouring to recover myfelf, Affimir (for that is the Name he goes by at this Court) approach'd, and gave me an Occafion to fee the Motto that was painted on his Shield, which perfuaded me, the Memory of his Unknown of Nicopolis was dear to him. I must confess, I was equally furpriz'd and overjoy'd, for I cou'd not flatter myfelf, with being flill in the Thoughts of that young Prince, who had not the fame Motives to infpire him. I had feen him, and was inform'd of his Name and Birth, but he had neither feen me, nor knew who I was; therefore what had touch'd him, was either Gratitude, or the obliging Expressions of my Z Letters,

The PRINCE

I.etters, which I must fay are no fmall Attractives to a generous Soul.

In short, Felicia, I have a mind that you fhou'd talk with him, and endeavour to difcover his Sentiments. The Management of this Affair, which I intrust you with, is of a nice quality; but as you are very difereet, I cannot imploy any one, who will give me lefs Sufpicion; tho' I muft own my Weaknefs to you, I am naturally of a jealous Temper, and a Confidant fo beautiful as you, with Affimir's Merit, might give me some Apprehenfion, were it not that you are entirely preposses d'in favour of the Count of La Vagne. Felicia threw her self at the Queen's Feet, and kiffing her Hand with great Refpect, faid to her; I have fo true a Senfe, Madam, of the Honour you do me, when you are pleas'd to confide in me, that I cannot eafily express my Acknowledgments for fo high a Favour; but whatever Ambition I have to ferve your Majefty, I am ftrangely diffident of my Ca-pacity, for I know that in fo important an Affair, one cannot act too prudently, which makes me fear I shall not answer the good Opinion you have conceiv'd of me. What, reply'd the Queen, wou'd you yield to another, the advantage of doing me a piece of Service ? Is not your Affection for me great enough to prevent you from acting those Faults, you foresee? Felicia understood by what the Queen faid to her, that her Majesty wou'd be highly disoblig'd, shou'd she neglect so fair an Opportunity portunity of ferving her, therefore confidering the unhappy State of her Captivity, fhe made no other Reply, but that fhe was ready to obey her Commands. You must then write to Affimir, faid the Queen, and defire him to meet you on the Terrace adjoyning my Apartment, where you shall entertain him with some Particulars relating to me.

Felicia immediately retir'd, in order to write to Affimir, and finding Inea in her Chamber, fhe gave her an Account what had pafs'd between the Queen and her; then wrote her Letter in thefe Terms.

THO' I am unknown to you, my Lord, and you alfo a Stranger to me, I have a mighty defire to entertain you, which perhaps you may think very extraordinary. If you will be pleased to meet me this Evening on the Terrace Walk, next to the Queen of Fez's Apartment, I shall there explain my felf more at large.

Felicia.

This Letter Felicia fhew'd to the Queen, who call'd for one of her Pages, and charg'd him to go and deliver it to Affimir, who (as I told you before) was extremely afflicted at what Cafilda (under the Difguife of Don Sanche) had fpitefully intimated concerning Felicia. The mean while Zulema (who had ftay'd by the Prince) was faying all he cou'd to foften his Diffrefs; and as he was talking to him, they came to tell Affimir, that one of the Z 2 Queen Queen of Fez's Pages had a Letter to deliver to him. This caus'd fome Emotion in the Prince, who looking at his Friend; Can you conceive, faid he, what may be the meaning of this Letter? If I may believe my Thoughts, reply'd Zulema, they perfuade me, fome agreeable News is coming to you, my Lord. Whatever it be, faid the Prince, I defire you will fpeak to the Page; I am unwilling to fee him for fear he fhou'd difcover the Diforder I am in.

Zulema readily fatisfy'd the Prince's Impatience; he took the Letter, and brought it to him, which he no fooner open'd, but knew the Name and Writing. Heavens! How great was his Surprize! He cou'd not conceal his Tranfports, but giving the Letter back to Zulema, faid, am I in a Dream, or must I believe what I fee ? Is my Felicia in Granada, whilft I am bemoaning her Absence, and bereft of all Hopes of ever feeing her more? Zulema, my dear Zulema! how can I outlive fo unexpected a Felicity? Indeed, my Lord, reply'd his Friend, I am fenfibly touch'd at your good Fortune, and heartily congratulate you; but am afraid, you will go to the Palace of *Ab*baicyn, before your Wound is heal'd, which may prove very dangerous to you. Were I to hazard my Life, answer'd the Prince, I wou'd not defer the Pleafure of feeing her, and as I am not able to write, I defire you wou'd do it for me. I am assur'd, said Zulema, that fhe does not know the Condition you are in, otherotherwife fhe wou'd be very much concern'd at the little Gare you take of a Life, which ought to be dear to her; but I am ready to do any thing, my Lord, to oblige you; fo the Prince dictated thefe Lines.

YOU are not so great a Stranger to me, as you imagine, adorable Felicia. I do not doubt, but you will be convinc'd of it, asson as I have the Pleasure of Saluting you. I have had the Missfortune of receiving a Wound, which very much discomposes me, yet nothing shall prevent me attending your Commands.

Whilft the paffionate Prince was abandoning himfelf to a Thoufand Transports of Joy and Impatience, the Page deliver'd his Letter to the Queen, who having read it, was feiz'd with the deepest Chagrin. Was any Fatality like this, cry'd she? Assiming is acquainted with Felicia, and fays, he will attend her, tho' he is wounded. What Accident cou'd have happen'd to him, fince Yesterday? Sure there must needs be an intimate Understanding between Felicia, and him, tho' fhe has conceal'd it from me. I thought her Sentiments for the Count of La Vagne, wou'd have left me no room to apprehend any thing from her : But alas! How deceiv'd have I been? Well, I am refolv'd, fhe fhall neither fee him, nor fpeak to him. As Celima was thus reafoning with herfelf, Felicia enter'd her Chamber. Afsimir, faid the Queen to her, has receiv'd Zz your 342 your Letter, and is very much indifpos'd, therefore cou'd not write to you. Felicia feem'd concern'd at his Illnefs, thinking by that means to pay her Court to the Queen; but fhe cou'd not have taken a more indirect Step towards it, for Celima was fo prepoffefs'd with the Opinion of Felicia's having a Correfpondence with the Prince, that the moft innocent Actions of this young Slave, in her Eyes appear'd Criminal.

The King of Granada (being now indifpos'd,) fent his two Sons to vifit Celima, whom they invited to take the Air in the Foreft; this Queen accepted the Invitation, and as Affimir Illnefs had been confirm'd to her by the Princes, Mabomet and Ofmin, fhe did not in the leaft imagine, that he wou'd venture to go abroad; befides, Celima had obferv'd, that Ofmin was mightily taken with Felicia, which extremely pleas'd her; for fhe wou'd not have cared, had all the Monarchs of the Univerfe ador'd that lovely Captive, fo the Prince of Carency had but look'd on her Indifference.

Thus the Court fet out from the Palace of Abbaicyn, follow'd by a great Number of mufical Inftruments. All the Ladies were feated in little open Chariots, each of them having a Cavalier to drive them : Mahomet drove the Queen of Fez's Chariot, and Ofmin Felicia's. As they were going by the Palace of Alhambro, the Queen defired ihe might ftop a little to enquire after the King's Health.

Zulema

Zulema hearing that Celima was coming to the Palace, told the Prince fhe fhou'd pais under his Windows, and that if he was able to rife, perhaps he might fec Felicia. Heavens! cry'd the Prince, what wou'd not I do for fo dear a Satisfaction? With that, he leap'd out of Bed, and having put on fome Clothes, went and fat in one of the Balconies of his Apartment, where foon after he faw Celima. and Felicia attending her. Ofmin perceiving the Prince, defired this beauteous Lady to take Notice of him; but how fhall I express the Motions which feiz'd her Soul, when the knew him to be her Lover? The Prince of Carency on the other fide, was fo transported, that he was just going to speak to her, had not Zulema perfuaded him to the contrary.

Felicia was in fuch a diforder, that at first fhe knew not what to fay; but being extremely defirous to be inform'd by what Chance her falfe Lover happen'd to be in Granada, for fhe took him for the Count of La Vagne, fhe recover'd herfelf a little, and told Ofmin, that the Person he had shewn her appear'd to be a Stranger. You judge right, Madam, reply'd he, for he is a Genouese, of the noble Houfe of Fiefques: The late King having befieg'd Jaen, took him Prisoner, and fent him to the Castle of Salobrena, where my Father, my Bother, and I were confin'd. There I contracted an intimate Friendship with the Count of La Vagne, (that's his Title) and after Mahomet's Death, my Father coming to the Throne, Z 4 conceiv'd conceiv'd fo particular an Effeem for this illuftrious Count, that he gave him his Liberty, upon Condition, that he wou'd not part from Granada without his Confent; therefore he ftill remains with us, and we are daily charm'd with his noble and polite Behaviour.

These Encomiums, which Ofmin gave to the Count, were very acceptable to Felicia, not-withstanding the Reafons she had to be dif-fatisfy'd with his Conduct. She then ask'd him, when the Count had been taken Prifoner; but nothing cou'd affonish her more, than what Ofmin told her on that Subject; for either the Scene, which pass'd at Sallee between Olympia, the Count, and her, was a Vision, (which fhe had no room to believe) or what Ofmin was faying to her, cou'd not be fincere. This made her impatient to be with Inea, to entertain her with this furprizing Adventure; and the grew of a fudden to penfive, that fhe cou'd not make any Reply to the obliging Terms, in which Ofmin addrefs'd her. What is it that troubles you, divine Felicia, faid he to her? You feem very melancholy; do but confide in me, and I will ufe my beft Endea-vours to deferve fo great a Favour. Alas, my Lord! (reply'd Felicia, with a dejected Air) what Secret cou'd I impart to you? I am an unfortunate Captive, and perhaps I repine at the Cruelty of that Destiny, from whence flows the Sorrow, which you perceive. Vouchfafe, Madam, faid Ofmin, to accept of my Service; I may procure you your Liberty, and foon remove remove the Caufe of your Uneafinefs ; but you must at least give me leave to pay Homage to your transcendent Charms, fince they have inspir'd me with fuch Sentiments, as do not merit a difobliging Return. I conjure you, amiable Felicia, to be favourable to me, and let me feed my Passion with the Hopes of your Affection. I cannot answer your Request, my Lord, interrupted Felicia; I have too great a Regard for you, and as an Evincement of it, I declare, that I am neither defirous to be belov'd, nor dispos'd to receive an Impression: It is a Resolution I have made, which nothing shall induce me to change, therefore I intreat you, my Lord, never to think on me more. This Confession extremely furpriz'd Ofmin, who wou'd rather have met with more Diffimulation, and lefs Cruelty: But as Love is always deluding, he did not doubt, but in time he shou'd conquer an Indifference, which he thought unreasonable.

The Court being return'd from the Foreft, Celima, (whofe Thoughts were entirely imploy'd on her Rendezvous with the Prince of Carency) retir'd to her Palace, and Felicia went to her Chamber, where fhe found Inea, whom fhe embrac'd tenderly, and faid, How fhall I express to you, my Dear, the Agitation of my Mind? The Count of La Vagne is here; I have just feen him in the Palace of Alhambro; it is no Imagination; for he faluted me for respectfully, that I cou'd not help returning the Civility, and I am even asham'd of having difcover'd 246

cover'd my Weaknefs to a Man, who has deferv'd my Aversion: But alas! when Love commands, Reason must obey. I have something yet more furprizing to tell you, continu'd fhe; I am inform'd, he has been fome Months. in Andalusta, and by the Relation I have heard, I find he was taken Prifoner, about the time that I had a Dream at Sallee, which reprefented him to me engag'd with the Moors, and vanquish'd. Ofmin told me, the Count had been ever fince in the Caftle of Salobrena, or at Granada; but I fancy he defired him to fpeak to me in that manner, with a Defign to fcreen his Offence; for who knows whether he does not repent his unworthy Behaviour towards me; moreover, I am furpriz'd not to fee Olympia here, which makes me believe, the Moors took the Count at Sea, and that he has not been long in these Dominions. It is very probable, interrupted Inea; for what pafs'd at Sallee, is not to be contradicted, and perhaps he is now forry for having difobliged you; therefore you must refolve to pardon him. No, my dear Inea, reply'd Felicia; I shall never forget his Ingratitude ; he is still dear to me, I confess; yet I hope in time to banish him from my Heart. Oh Heavens! added she weeping, what a Series of Misfortunes attend me? I muft tell you fomething more; young Ofmin has declar'd himfelf my Votary, and you may judge how favourably I receiv'd his Addreffes. HIN SHIVE IS ONTO LOUTING

Whilft

Whilft Felicia and Inea were difcourfing together, the Queen of Fez fent for the Governefs of the Slaves, who (as I told you before) was an ugly old Woman, and commanded her to wrap herfelf in her Veil, and wait on the Terrace for the Prince of Carency's Arrival; fhe charg'd her at the fame time, not to difcover herfelf, but to appear overjoy'd at feeing him, in cafe he took her for Felicia, It was a Moon-Light Night, and the amorous Prince, leaning on Cafilda (whom he took for a young Man) was making as much hafte towards the Place appointed, as his Strength wou'd permit him; and perceiving at a distance a tall Perfon walking on the Terrace, he did not doubt, but it was his charming Felicia; therefore approaching her, he faid : Ah, Madam ! has Fortune brought you to me again, after having fo long bemoan'd your Abfence, and spent Days and Nights endeavouring to find you? I can hardly believe my Eyes: Is it you yourfelf, my divine Mistrefs? Here transported with Love and Joy, he went to throw off this Woman's Veil, who not being quick enough to take hold of it, let it fall on the Ground, and difcover'd a Face, which was as Ugly, as Felicia's was Beautiful.

His Aftonishment was fo great, that he cou'd not help crying out aloud, and any one might have perceiv'd, by his Emotion, the strange Diforder he was in. The Queen being in a Closet, that look'd on the Terrace Walk, eafily faw the Prince's Action, and knew his his Voice, which made her guess what had pass'd; therefore approaching him with a Majestick Air; I am come to your Affistance, Prince, faid she, (taking his Hand and smiling,) follow me, I have something to tell you, which is of too great a Confequence to be conceal'd from you any longer.

The Queen went in first, but Casilda being oblig'd to wait without, was mighty uncafy. concerning what might pass between Celima and the Prince. This inquisitive Creature stay'd till the Governess of the Slaves was retired, then plac'd herfelf near the Clofet, where she cou'd cafily hear their Conversation. The Queen looking at the Prince, who was not well recover'd from his Surprize; I have been imploying my Skill for you, my Lord, faid fhe, and by the help of my Books, and the Figures I have caft, am already acquainted with fome of your Adventures; moreover, I can affure you, that I interest myself very much in what concerns you, and if you will be fincere with me, I do not in the least doubt but I shall be able, by the Affiftance of my powerful Art, to put you in a way of overcoming your ill Fortune. I am persuaded, Madam, reply'd the Prince, that a Sovereign, who has fo great an Influence as your Majefty, may eafily change my Deftiny, without confulting the Stars; yet I cannot flatter myfelf with deferving fo extraordinary a Favour. As an Evincement of the Progrefs I have already made, faid Celima, I know, Affimir is not your Name, and

and that by your Birth, you are nearly related to agreat King. The Prince of Carency was amaz'd to hear the Queen express herfelf in these Terms, and before he cou'd make her any Answer: Nay, continu'd she, you will own my Knowledge is, no Fiction, when I tell you, that you was in Misia, and taken Prisoner by Bajazet; besides, whilft you were in the Tower of Nicopolis, did not you receive very passionate Letters, and a confiderable Supply from a Lady, who, to this Hour, is unknown to you? The Prince figh'd, and feeing Celima waited an Anfwer; It is, as your Majesty fays, reply'd he, and fince you are fo well inform'd of what has happen'd to me, I beg, Madam, you will tell me who was that charming Unknown. This Request extremely pleas d the Queen, who con-cealing her Satisfaction, faid to him, Out of what Motive, do you defire to know this Lady, perhaps you may never fee her? That is a Misfortune, I fear, Madam, interrupted the Prince wer Lefer Content the Prince; yet I often flatter myfelf, that fome lucky Chance will convey me were she is. But (added the Queen, in an Accent which difcover'd part of her Sentiments) is it possible, that the Memory of a Person can be still dear to you, who had no other Attractive to engage you, but her writing a few obliging Letters, and fending you a Sum of Money to pay your Ranfom ? Ah, Madam ! reply'd he, there are Impressions, which never can be effac'd, and cou'd you conceive the Torments I have endured endured for that Unknown, you wou'd foon be convinc'd, that one may feel the sharpest Darts of Love, without feeing the influencing Object. Is it then really true, faid the Queen, that you are impatient to fee her, and that she often imploys your Thoughts? I declare it is fincerely fo, Madam, answer'd the Prince, and there is nothing I with more ardently, than an Opportunity of making my Retributions' to a Lady, who has conferr'd to high an Obligation on me. Well, Prince, faid Celima fmiling, I will confult with fome favourable Genius in order to compleat your Desire. Come to me to Morrow at the fame Hour, and you shall be farther inform'd of this Subject. The Prince return'd his Acknowledgments to her in a most grateful Manner, and retir'd to the Palace of Alhambro with the difguis'd Cafilda, who was waiting on the Terrace.

Zulema (impatient to know what had pafs'd at the Abbaicyn) repair'd foon after to the Prince's Apartment, and Cafilda (who perceiv'd, they had fome matter of Importance to communicate to one another, feigning to withdraw) went and hid herfelf in a Place, where fhe cou'd hear their Conversation. You think, perhaps, faid the Prince to Zulema, that I have feen Felicia, and am going to inform you of the Particulars of an agreeable Rendezvous; but instead of that, my dear Friend, I must tell you, fome Dæmon appear'd to me in the Shape of an ugly old Creature, and that I was in the greatest Aftonishment, when the Queen

Queen of Fez came upon the Terrace, and defired me to follow her into her Clofet; where I no fooner enter'd, but fhe endeavour'd to perfuade me, that fhe had acquired an extraordinary Knowledge, by corresponding with good and evil Genius's, and in reality fhe told me every thing relating to my Adventure at Nicopolis, which very much furpriz'd me; for fhe certainly must have been inform'd of it, by the Unknown herfelf, whom, I believe, is now amongst her Slaves; and I cannot put it out of my Head, but Felicia wrote to me by the Queen's Orders.

Here the Prince was fome time filent, and Zulema spoke to him in these Terms: I begin to have a Thought, which appears to me very probable, and you may judge of it your felf, my Lord, when I have inform'd you, that Celima herfelf was at Nicopolis, at the time that the Christians were defeated by Bajazet : As you were of the number of the Prisoners, it is likely the faw you, and receiv'd an Impref-fion; befides, if you confider the Prefent, which was fent you in the Tower, it cou'd not come from a Person of an inferiour Rank, and-You give me fuch a Light into the matter, interrupted the Prince, as opens my-Eyes at once. I cannot call to mind what the Queen faid to me the Day of her Arrival, and the Conversation we have just had, together, without being convinc'd, that she is my Unknown of Nicopolis. Alas! into what a Labyrinth am I fallen? Felicia is with her, and

and if fhe difcovers my Paffion for that lovely Creature, I fear fhe will make her feel the Effects of her Revenge. Ah, cruel Deftiny! cry'd he; am I born only to pafs my Days in a continual Series of Woes, and have you decreed, that I fhall never be happy? Here, the tormenting Thoughts of his paft Difappointment, came frefh to his Mind, and interrupting his Difcourfe, threw him into fo deep a Melancholy, that even his Friend Zulema endeavour'd unfuccefsfully to divert it; therefore as it was late, he took his leave of the Prince, tho' extremely concern'd at not having it in his Power to give him fome Relief.

Whilft the Prince and Zulema were entertaining each other, Cafilda heard their whole Conversation; and finding she had no hopes left of ever touching the Heart of a Prince, for whom she had already acted many Extravagances, she resolv'd on some desperate Undertaking. Her Revenge against her Rival was more predominant, than either the Pafsion she had for the Prince, or her own Honour; fo that nothing less than the Death of the unhappy Leonida cou'd fatisfy her raging Spirit.

The Queen of Fez (extremely overjoy'd at what the Prince of Carency had faid to her) was forming a thoufand agreeable Projects, not doubting but his Paffion for his Unknown of Nicopolis was very fincere, and that he wou'd be equally transported to find she was the Perfon; yet as her Jealoufy of Felicia gave her much Uneafinefs, she thought it prudent dent, first to clear her Suspicions on that Subject; for, faid the, if the Prince has feen that beautiful Captive, he must needs love her; therefore I will contrive, they shall meet in a place where I may hear their Difcourfe, which will give me fome Infight into the matter.

Celima immediately fent for Felicia, and be-ing alone with her : I command you, faid the, to be fincere with me. Confider, you are my Slave, and that your Deftiny is in my Power; I can make you happy, if you will confess the Truth. Read this ! (continu'd she, flewing her the Letter, which the Prince of Carency had defired Zulema to write) do you know the Writing? Felicia read it, and having examin'd it fome time, told the Queen the fincerely cou'd not tell whofe Hand it was, which in fome Measure fatisfy'd Celima; yet to be thoroughly convinc'd in an Affair, that fo nearly concern'd her ; Tell me, faid she, have you ever heard of the House of Bourbon, related to the Kings of France ? Felicia, at this Question, did not doubt but the Queen knew her, and without being any ways out of Countenance, reply'd, that the Name of fo illustrious a Family was not unknown to her. And are you acquainted with any one of that Name, faid Celima? Did not you fee the Count of La March, or the Prince of Carency, when you were in Spain? No, Madam, answer'd the, I never faw those Princes; they are intire Strangers to me. Know then, Felicia, interrupted the Queen of Fez, that the Perfon I

I fpoke of, and who appear'd fo charming to me, is of the House of Bourbon, and is call'd the Prince of Carency: I have a mind you shou'd talk with him, and endeavour to penetrate into his Sentiments; he came here last Night, when I order'd the Governess of the Slaves to entertain him; but the managed the matter fo very ill, that I must wholly depend upon you. Had the Queen's Thoughts been lefs prepoffefs'd with her Project, she might have difcover'd Felicia's Surprize, when the heard, the Prince of Carency was the Perfon whom the Queen lov'd, and that he was actually in Granada: But her mind being otherways employ'd, this young Slave had time to recover from her Diforder, and faid to Celima; Your Pleafure, Madam; is fo dear to me, that I fear I shall not be able to effect your Majefty's Commands with Success; for I have but very little Experience, and shou'd I miscarry in an Affair, which requires fo much Prudence, I cou'd never forgive myfelf. No, reply'd the Queen, do not let that give you the least Uncalinefs; I know you better than you know yourfelf, and am perfuaded, you cannot do any thing amifs: But as the Moon shines very bright, I do not think it proper you fhou'd meet the Prince on the Terrace, becaufe I faw many People walking there laft Night, and it wou'd not be convenient I shou'd be feen with him; therefore I will give Orders, that he may be convey'd to the Grotto in the Wood, where you may entertain him till I come to you. Felicia

Felicia having receiv'd her Instructions, retir'd to her Chamber very much troubled, which Inea peceiving ; Lovely Felicia, faid fhe, do not conceal your Thoughts, but tell me the Caufe of your Pain. Ah, my dear Inea! (cry'd Felicia) nothing but fresh Afflictions attend me. The Prince of Carency is in Granada, and goes by the Name of Afimir; 'tis he, whom the Queen loves, and by her Command, I am to have an Interview with him this Évening. What! interrupted Inga, can that give you any Uneafinefs? Do you confider, that Heaven has fent him here, to put a Period to your Miferies? He will procure you your Liberty, and carry you back to your native Land, where all your Wifhes will be crown'd with Felicity, whilft unfortunate Inea, absent from her dear Don Ramire, must pass the Remainder of her Life in Tears and Captivity. You bewail your Deftiny, reply'd Felicia, and you think, that my being united to the Prince of Carency will make mine happier; Alas! you are very much deceiv'd, for we have conceiv'd a fecret Antipathy for each other, and must never expect a perfect Satisfaction in our Alliance: Besides, do you imagine, that I can fo eafily banish the Count of La Vagne from my Thoughts? In spite of his Infidelity, he is still dear to me, and it's probable he is now forry for having offended me: at leaft, his Eyes tell me fo, and his Repentance may deserve Pardon. In short, Inea, I believe he loves me; but let it be as it will, A a 2 rhe

the Prince shall not know who I am: As he has feen my Picture, he may call to mind its Refemblance, therefore I will hid my Face fo well, that he shall not fee it. Inea finding Felicia was fix'd on that Resolution, wou'd not any ways oppose it, tho' she was of a contrary Opinion.

The Prince of Carency was now thinking on means to convey a Letter to Felicia, in order to know, how he might have an Opportunity of entertaining her. He told his Defign to Zulema, who advis'd him not to write, for fear his Letter shou'd fall into the Hands of the Queen of Fez, but promis'd him, he wou'd contrive fome way to speak to her. By this time, the Hour of the Prince's Appointment was near, yet he made no great haste to go to the Palace, for he began to reflect, that a Second Interview with Celima wou'd only puzzle him, because he believ'd, she was his Unknown of Nicopolis, and that, were she inform'd of his Passion for Felicia, it might prove of a fatal Confequence.

Zulema put him in mind to repair to his Rendezvous; at last taking the supposed Don Sanche with him, he went with some Reluctancy to the Abbaicyn, where he found a Mute waiting on the Terrace, who convey'd him to the Grotto; Felicia came son after, so entirely hidden from Head to Foot, ina large white Veil, that it was impossible to know her. The Prince did not doubt in seing her, but it was the same old Woman he had had met the Night before; which made him. refolve not to have any difcourfe with her. Felicia on the other fide (who felt strange Emotions, finding her felf, at that Inftant, with the Prince of Carency) was fome time without fpeaking; but fhe had fcarcely broke Silence, when the Prince, knowing the Voice of his lovely Mistrefs, went and flung himself at her. Feet. Leonida, Charming Leonida! faid he, what a Bleffing is this ? Have I found you at laft, and have you still the fame obliging Sentiments for me, which you had, when I was in the House of the Traitor Benavidez? Leonida, calling to mind what had pass'd at Sallee, was griev'd at this Discourse: Go, faid she! (breaking out into a Passion) go, ungrateful Man! have you forgot the Caufe, you have given me to upbraid you? The Prince thinking the was angry, that he had conceal'd his Name from her; I am guilty, Madam, I confess, reply'd he, for not having confided in you; I ought to have told you, that I was the Prince of Carency, and not have appear'd under an other Title ; but the cruel Defigns of Leonora (by whofe Orders I was purfued, when I parted from Villa-Real, and wounded in the Foreft, where you found me) was the Occasion I chang'd my Name, and took that of the Count of La Vagne, whom I very much refembled. This is my only Crime, divine Leonida; fure it is not fo enormous, as to be unpardonable. Whilft the Prince was talking in this manner, Leoni-Aaz da da (whofe Surprize was great) had a thoufand different Imaginations; and cou'd not tell what Judgment to make: At last the Prince, impatient to hear her speak; Ah, Madam, faid he, how much do I dread, that you are no more the fame for me? Here, you fee me at your Feet in Transports of inexpressible Joy, whilft you, my Beauteous Mistress, are indifferent and melancholy. What difobliging Sentiments have you receiv'd for a Man, who adores you, and whom Deftiny has decreed to be yours? Do you confider, that I am going to offer up to you the Remainder of my Life, and that, from the fatal Moment I lost you, no Torment cou'd be equal to that I endured? Be affurd, Madam, that the Prince of Carency has a Passion for you, no ways inferior to that, which you found in the Count of La Vagne. I must own to you, my Lord, reply'd Leonida, that I cannot believe what I hear; for when you were at Sallee, you even trea-ted me with Difdain: What greater Offence cou'd you give me, than to abandon me as you did, and go away with Olympia Doria, whom you paffionately lov'd? Do you think, my Senfes cou'd deceive me, or that I am not capable of refenting the Perfidy? I cannot tell to this Hour, whether you are the Prince of Carency, or the Count of La Vagne; but what I am certain of, is, that you are the Perfon, who has highly injured me, and it wou'd be a shameful Weakness in me to pardon you. These Words strangely confounded the Prince, who who believ'd his dear Leonida's Mind was difcompos'd; and what confirm'd this Opinion,. was his being perfunded, that the Count of La Vagne perished at Sca, in his Return from Nicopolis, and that Olympia Doria died in her. Father's House at Genoa. These were Circumftances, he cou'd no ways doubt of; and as for his Voyage to Sallee, he had never been there; fo that he look'd on all her Reproaches as Visionary, which threw him into' a' despairing Condition; yet he wou'd not let her perceive the Trouble he was in, nor what occasion'd it, but continu'd speaking to her in a very obliging manner: You do me a great deal of Wrong, Charming Leonida, faid he, to her fighing, and I shou'd not find it a very hard Task to justify myself, tho' I fancy, I have the most Caufe to complain. What must Lijudge of the Letter you writ to Cafilda, when you and Benavidez contriv'd your going off, which was a thing, I cou'd never have believ'd you guilty of ? And what shall I conjecture from your being at Constantinople, and the Grand Seignior's Paffion for you? Leonida heard the Prince with Aftonishment, and thought likewife, he knew not what he faid; she cou'd not imagine how a Man of fo good Senfe cou'd talk after fuch an extravagant manner; and as her Affection was more predominant than her Refentment, the was fentibly griev'd athis Misfortune. Who I! my Lord, cry'd fhe; did I write to Cafilda, or give my Confent to Bepavidez's infolent Behaviour; and was I ever 11 3 Aa4 in in Turkey? These Things are fo new to me, and to far from being true, that I cannot bear to hear 'em : How long have you entertained thefe Chimeras? Here the took the Prince's Hand, and cou'd not restrain her Tears; which proof of her Tendernefs, with the other Circumftances, fo thoroughly touch'd him, that he was foon convinc'd of her Sincerity. Let us do Justice to each other, most amiable Leonida, (faid the Prince, printing an ardent Kifs on her fair Hand ;) be affur'd I never was falfe to you. I fhou'd be willing to fatisfy you, interrupted Leonida, cou'd I forget the Adventure, which happen'd to me lately at Sallee: She then recited to him her whole Story, with fo much Wit and Coherence, that he perceiv'd, what he had taken for an Effect of Lunacy, was supported by folid Appearances; therefore having explain'd matters, they came to a right Understanding, which created unspeakable Transports in these two Lovers.

One may eafily imagine the Confernation of Cafilda; who had heard their whole Difcourfe, and was diftracted to fee fo perfect a Sympathy between Leonida and the Prince. All her Perfidioufnefs, as well as her Brother's, was laid open, and feeing herfelf fruftrated of those hopes, which had flatter'd her till then, she had like (in her exceffive Despair) to have enter'd the Grotto, with a full design to stab Leonida; but as she confider'd, that the Prince wou'd prevent the Blow, and disappoint her revengtul Attempt, she deferr'd her wicked Action, till till fhe found a fairer Opportunity of executing it.

After Leonida and the Prince of Carency had given each other reciprocal Affurances of their Joy and Affection, they confulted, how they fhou'd behave themfelves towards the Queen of Fez, till they cou'd find an Opportunity of going off. While they were on this Subject, the Queen came to the Grotto; but I must tell you, what prevented her from repairing thither fooner.

As Celima was coming out of her Apartment, they told her, that Mahomet was in the Palace, and had fomething of the highest Importance to communicate to her: She had given Orders, that no body shou'd be admitted that Evening; yet as that Prince's Visit feem'd to import some weighty matter, she wou'd not refuse seeing him. Mahomet addreffing the Queen, told her, that Mula, Favorite to Abelhamar, was just arriv'd from Fez, with a Letter to her from his Master, and that being a particular Acquaintance of his, he had apply'd to him for a private Audience, which if fhe was pleas'd to grant, he wou'd immediately fend for him. Tho' Celima was very impatient to be at her Rendezvous with the Prince of Carency, yet on this Occasion, fhe was forc'd to yield to her Politicks, fearing, that if she shou'd defer this Affair till the next Day, Mahamet might suspect the was imploy'd in some more agreeable Occupation ; therefore having assented to Mula's Admit-L COLOT tance.

The PRINCE

tance, he came and threw himfelf at the Queen's Feet, and prefented her with a Letter from the Prince his Master, which was written in these Terms.

THO I have an indisputable Right to the Kingdom of Fez, and am now in the Posselion of it, yet I am willing, Madam, to yield up one half of it to you, upon Condition, that you will give me Felicia. Before I had seen her, nothing could be equal to my Ambition; but now her Charms have made so deep an Impression in my Heart, that all other Passions have submitted to my transcendent Love. I can never be happy without ber, and if I am indebted to you for the Posselfion of that lovely Creature, half my Kingdom will be too small a Return, for so high an Obligation; therefore grant me but your Slave, and I will acknowledge you for my Sovereign.

Abelhamar.

Celima having read this Letter in the Prefence of Mahamet, they both admired Abelhamar's Paffion for Felicia; and as Mahamet's Vows were already dedicated to the Queen of Fez, he was overjoy'd to find, that this Occafion afforded her fure means of recovering, at leaft one part of her Dominions. He joyn'd with Mula in his Propofals, and offer'd to go himfelf with Felicia to Sallee, in order to bring back with him fuch Hoftages from Abelhamar, as fhou'd warrant the performance of the Treaty. Celima, with a gracious Air, return'd turn'd Mahomet Thanks and affur'd him, the fhou'd never forget the generous manner, in which he efpous d her Intereft; but as Abelhamar's Propofals requir'd fome Confideration, fhe defired, her Anfwer might be fufpended till the next Day; then Mula withdrew, and left the Prince there, who took fo great a Pleafure in entertaining the Queen, that he did not retire till it was late, which gave time to the Prince of Carency and his Miftrefs, to take fome Meafures relating to their particular Affairs.

Mahomet having taken leave of the Queen, fhe immediately went to the Grotto, where being enter'd, Leonida, out of Respect retir'd, and left her alone with the Prince of Carency. This lovely Captive was walking in the Wood, with her Thoughts entirely imploy'd on the Happiness, the propos'd to herfelf, thro' the means of her faithful Lover : but alas, Fate was preparing a New Tragedy ; Cafilda (still under a Man's Difguise) distracted with Jealoufy, at what she had just heard, and feeing her Rival walking alone, thought fhe might eafily pierce her Heart, before any one cou'd come to her Affiftance; fo running up to her like a Fury, fhe drew out her Poinard. and plung'd it into Leonida's Breast, who fell with the Blow, crying out for help, and calling the Prince of Carency; at which Name, Cafilda was poffefs'd with fuch inhuman Rage, that the repeated her Blows. The Grotto not being diftant, the Prince was struck at the mournful Accents of his wounded Mistrefs, and

and leaving the Queen fuddenly, he made hafte toward the Place where he heard Leonida's Voice; he faw her lying on the Ground bath'd in Blood, and perceiv'd Don Sanche running away, which convinc'd him that he was the Murderer; he immediately purfu'd him, and with his Sword run him through: After he had thus reveng'd unfortunate Leonida, he came up to her; but oh! what a lamentable Condition did he find her in? She express'd herfelf with painful Sighs, and had fcarce Strength enough to take her Lover's Hand, which made him fear, her beauteous Eyes were going to yield up all their Charms to that univerfal Conqueror, Death.

How shall I here paint the disconsolate State of our unhappy Prince; he was refolv'd not to furvive fo great a Misfortune, and had already turn'd the Point of his Sword to his Breast, when the Queen (who had follow'd him out of the Grotto) interpos'd, and prevented him from acting his own Death: She repeated her Shrieksin fo preffing a manner, that the Guards immediately came up to her, and foon after, most of her Attendants, with a great Number of Flambeaux, which shew'd all the Horror of this Tragick Scene. It was not long before they were inform'd of it at the Palace of Alhambro: The two Princes, Mahomet and Ofmin, came to the Abbaicyn, with Mula and another Gentleman, who had accompanyed him in his Voyage from Sallee: In fhort, the Wood was full of People, who were in bas a a strange Consternation; Leonida wounded, (lying in the Arms of a defpairing Prince, who was near losing his Mistres) mov'd all Hearts with Compassion.

On the other hand, Cafilda (that wretched Creature) was tearing open her Wounds, to haften her deferv'd Death : Zulema approach'd her, and ftill thinking fhe was a Man; Ah Barbarous Villain, that you are, cry'd he to her; what Dæmon urg'd you to commit a Crime fo black? Tell me, what had innocent Felicia done to you, and how came you to murder her in this cruel manner? I am Cafilda, (reply'd fhe with a furious Air) and fhe was my Rival; go to your Friend, and he will tell you the reft. Thefe were the laft and only Words fhe pronounc'd with her expiring Breath.

Tho' Leonida's Life was defpair'd of, yet the Surgeons were fent for, who us'd all their Skill to ftop the bleeding of her Wounds, which they drefs'd, and having affifted her with proper Remedies, her Spirits began to revive: She open'd her weak Eyes, then fix'd them on the Prince, who held her in his Arms, and appear'd in as great want of Relief, as his dying Miftrefs. At laft they took her from him, and carry'd her by the Queen's Order to her Chamber, where fhe was laid in Bed, and Inea, who had a tender Affection for Leonida, ftaid by her almoft inconfolable for the unluck y Accident, which had happen'd to her illuftrious Companion. She was fo fenfibly touch'd at it, that even the Prefence of Don Ramire cou'd not mitigate her exceffive Grief. He was just arriv'd from Fez, where he had been, in Expectation of finding his dear Inea, who had fent him a Letter whils her Captivity: But before he cou'd reach Sallee, the Queen was embark'd, which oblig'd him to wait there for a favourable Opportunity of coming over to Granada; and as about this time Mula was fetting out for that Kingdom, he took his Passage in the fame Ship.

Ofmin, who had a real Paffion for Leonida, was thoroughly concern'd at her Misfortune; and as for the Queen of Fez, fhe cou'd not help being mov'd at this difmal Adventure, tho' fhe prudently conceal'd her Thoughts. The Prince of Carency's mournful Complaints, too well confirm'd her Suspicions in relation to his Sentiments for Leonida; and the faw him possels'd with fo violent a Despair, that she had no room left for any hopes, no not even to come to an Agreement with Abelhamar; for in the first Place, she was convinc'd, that shou'd Leonida die of her Wounds, her Death wou'd render his Propofals of no Effect; and on the other Hand, the forefaw, that if the recover'd, the Prince wou'd claim her as one, perhaps, he had lov'd a long time, and whom he intended to marry.

As for Mula, he was fo amaz'd, that he cou'd fcarcely believe his own Eyes; for tho' he was prefent when his Mafter fought the brave brave Count of La Vagne, and kill'd him, and that he faw him give up his last Breath in Olympia's Arms, yet he cou'd not be perfuaded, but the Prince of Carency was that fame Count; fo great was their Refemblance.

The Prince, all this while, was like a Man whofe Senfes had abandon'd him, and in that Condition, the Queen of Fez gave Orders, that he fhou'd be carry'd into one of the Apartments of the Abbaicyn, where being laid on a Bed, his Wound open'd afresh, and there gush'd from it a great Quantity of Blood, which alarm'd all his Friends, particularly Ofmin, who look'd on him as his Rival, and notwithstanding, shew'd a funcere Trouble for his Misfortune, as well as his generous Friend Zulema.

No body cou'd now tell who was in the greatest Danger, the Prince of Carency or Leonida; they both continu'd extremely ill: His exceffive Grief for the Condition of his beloved Mistress, retarded his Recovery, till they assurd him, there was Hopes of her Life; which agreeable News caus'd fo wonderful an Effect in him, that his Wound was foon heal'd, and in a few Days he was able to visit her, who was also in no fmall Concern for the State of her Lover's Health. The Prefence of this lovely Prince had fo great an Influence on her, that it contributed likewife to her speedy Recovery: His daily Attendance and tender Care gave her more Relief than all the Remedies, which the the Surgeons apply'd to her Wounds; and it may be faid, that as Love was the Author of the Pains and Difafters of these constant Lovers, he was also their Physician and Comfort. No Satisfaction cou'd be equal to theirs, nor is it possible to conceive the endearing Expressions, they mutually exchang'd, during their Illness.

By this time it was known, thro' the means of Inea, that Leonida was Daughter to Don John of Velasco, and Zulema having mention'd Casilda's Name, she also inform'd the Court of her being of the Family of the Benavidez's, and related to them the whole Story, as she had heard it from Leonida.

As to the Prince of Garency's Name, it was not long kept a Secret; Celima told the King of Granada who he was, which added fo much to the Esteem, he had already acquir'd, thro' his perfonal Merit, that he receiv'd all poffible Marks of Honour from the King, who went often to fee him after this unhappy Adventure; and endeavouring to confole the Prince, amongst other obliging Expressions, he told him, he reftor'd him to his 'Liberty, for which, he defired no other Ranfom than his Friendship, and that had he known fooner of his being of the Houfe of Bourbon, he wou'd have thewn him all the Diffinction, that was due to fo illustrious a Family

The Prince, who now faw Leonida out of Danger, was very willing to retrieve his Liberty, berty at any rate : He readily accepted of the King of Granada's generous Offer, and return'd him Thanks for that, and the many other Favours he had confer'd on him, fince the time he was taken Prifoner.

Celima, notwithstanding Leonida was her Rival, extremely pity'd her, and order'd that all the Attendance imaginable shou'd be given her: She also visited the Prince, who laying aside the Respect due to her Rank, receiv'd her with so much Indifferency, that she refolv'd never more to speak to him of his Unknown of Nicopolis.

The mean while the King of Granada (who was defirous to compleat the Prince of Carency's good Fortune, and had a Defign, at the fame time, to oblige the Spaniards) thought on means to procure Leonida her Liberty; he therefore addrefs'd himfelf to the Queen of Fez, offering her whatever Sum, she wou'd please to demand for the Ranfom of that young Lady : But Celima, whofe Greatness of Spirit was equal to her Passion, resolv'd no Sovereign fhou'd furpafs her in Generofity; the Prince of Carency being a Christian, and in Love with her Slave, was enough to make her determine never to think of him more. She told the King of Granada, that far from requiring any Ranfom for Leonida, fhe defired, he wou'd accept and difpofe of her, as he thought fit; and that not only Leonida, but all the reft of her Slaves were at his Command if agreeable to him. The King heard with Pleafure Celima's Answer, and in his Turn, gallantly. presented Bb prefented Leonida to the Prince of Carency, who receiv'd her with inexprefible Marks of Joy and Gratitude, but cou'd not find Words to make a Retribution fuitable to the Prefent.

The chief and only Care of thefe happy Lovers confifted now in giving each other daily Proofs of their tender Affection. Their long and cruel Difappointments made their Felicity the greater; and tho' they were not as yet Perfectly recover'd, they were proposing Means to leave Granada, in order to perform the Promife which their Parents had made for them in their infant Years. 'The Prince wrote to Don John of Velasco at Villa-Real, acquainting him with the Particulars of his and Leonida's Fortune, and withal, that he hop'd foon to be the happieft of Mankind.

Mula (feeing his Master's Defigns were render'd impracticable through this Adventure between the Prince of Carency and Leonida) went back to Sallee, and gave Abelhamar an Account of what had pass'd; which News fo cruelly affected him, that the Lofs of his Miftrefs had like to have made him act his own Death; but as an Evincement of the Greatness of his Passion, he took a Resolution proportionable to it; for having renounc'd to the Crown of Fez, he retired to a Castle on the Sea-fide, where he confectated the Remainder of his Life to the dear Memory of his Felicia. Celima foon receiv'd Advice of this unexpected Change; and as Makomet was extremely follicitous to ferve her in fo favourable a Conjuncture, Conjuncture, he intreated the King of Granada, his Father, to give him a Fleet and fome Forces, in order to reinstate the Queen of Fez; which being granted, he took the Command entirely upon himfelf, and convoy'd her to Sallee, where, far from meeting with any Opposition, she found all Things in a perfect Tranquility. By this time her Mind was more at Eafe; for having confider'd that fhe cou'd no longer hope to receive an obliging return to the Passion, she had for the Prince of Carency, the thought nothing wou'd fooner effect it's Cure, than approving Makomet's Vows; therefore being of too haughty a Temper to bear with the Difdain of the one, and Gratitude pleading in behalf of the other, flie at once refolv'd to give her Hand, and all her Affection to Mahomet, who by this Alliance faw his Love and Ambition fatisfy'd.

Celima, before she parted from Granada, refor'd Inea to her Liberty, and Don Ramire took her with him to Toledo, where thefe two Lovers, by a happy Union, receiv'd the Reward of their Constancy.

What I have farther to add relating to the Prince of Carency and Leonida, is, that as foon as they were in a Condition to fet out on their Journey, they took leave of the King of Granada, who made them confiderable Prefents, and order'd feveral Noblemen with a ftrong Detachment of his Guards to conduct them as far as the Frontiers of Spain; whence they pro-ceeded to Villa Real, where they were receiv'd with

with a Satisfaction equal to the Occasion. Their long Sufferings intitled them to fuch Bleflings, as hardly any who wore the Chains of Love cou'd expect. Leonida, in whom fo many Perfections were affembled, was too great a Prize for an indifferent Heroe, and the Prince of Carency, whole Accomplishments render'd him one of the finest Gentlemen of his time, might juftly claim a Place in her Affection. In fhort, where fo much Virtue and Merit was united, Love must be triumphant. Then let us leave the Prince and Leonida to the bounteous Care of Hymen, whofe foft Endearments cou'd only recompence their past Misfortunes, and crown their Days with true Felicity.
